Foreword

TEARS ON MY PILLOW

It is increasingly difficult to master pain!
Impossible to change another human being. The best you can do, is to look out for yourself not to be the next victim.

This day and age does not favor the feeble, you must learn to fend for yourself! Understand your value and never allow to settle for less.

It is time to be bold, self aware and courageous enough to choose the life you deserve and walk that road with no regrets.

Tears on my pillow addresses pain, betrayal, rejection, emotional and physiological torture that people face daily. But most importantly; Tears on my pillow will give you the courage and wings to fly high, it's a re-birth of hope for those that have battled pain and internally lost the battle.

No more massive corporations of pity party! Choose to master the courage! You're not anyone's option, choose to be someone's priority! Choose to wipe away your tears, you need to face the future with courage.

MY STORY

*F*or the past five years we've been working with 911 couples, those at the brink of divorce. I must say most times what we do is resuscitating dying couples. Teaching them how to resolve their conflicts and differences to live a happy life

I didn't choose my career, I believe from experience that my career chose me. You see, I grew up in an incredible, loving, prayerful family, with two loving parents and five siblings with me as the first-born. Surrounded by the loving arms of the church, family friends and extended family! Until one fateful day when my mother told me she was not happy and things are falling apart. ...to be precise our family, my sense of belonging, my protection, my nest was falling apart.

After 19 to 20 years no one saw it coming, No one warned me! Little did I know a lot had been boiling underneath, during my endless quest in the years to follow, I stumbled upon one by one of the reasons why my nest burst, most of which could have been rectified had they been detected for your love,

earlier, some could have been completely avoided!

You know a divorce not only ends a marriage, it dissolves a family. I still remember the fear, the sleepless nights, the cold sweat in the middle of the night, the fear of uncertainty, what would the future bring? The breakup of my family still lingers today, that's because divorce is forever.

Now my parent's divorce made me very curious and incredibly impatient to learn everything I could about how to have a happy, health lasting marriage so I can apply it to my own family and marriage.

The other thing that my parents marriage made me do was being able to teach people from different walks of life and I just don't mean the couples in our practice, I do some of my best work on the streets, super markets, banking halls, restaurants and on phone.

Many of the issues revolve around one partner longing for more connection, more touch, or more sex While the other partner acts like, can you get a life? It's not a big deal...

Connection and feeling loved is a big deal

CONNECTION AND FEELING LOVED IS A BIG DEAL

It's about being wanted, needed, attractive
That's why when the connection dies, when disconnection happens intimacy at all levels goes right out the door.

Rejection hurts! We all know how we connect but we must seek to know how our partners also connect and be able to make a deliberate effort to communicate love in the way our partners understand.

Life is relationships, everything else is just specifics.

We are designed for relationships, yet they often bring us pain.

We are made for relationships!
We are made with the capacity to choose!

We are made to take responsibility!

All relationships involve choices, we are supposed to have great relationships with others and with ourselves.

In this book, we expose destructive relationship traits that characterize nearly most relationship conflicts.

Understanding them will transform your marriage and relationships.

We are made for relationships!

We are made with the capacity to choose!

We are made to take responsibility!

We warn you about the consequences of neglect, rejection, attitude, ego, negative behavior, ignorance, and disengagement in relationships and marriage and how your protection is in your own hands and decisions.

Ego is just a three-letter word but it can destroy anything on its path including relationships of all kinds.

All people have it but only few have the courage and strength to put it aside to save what is more important and meaningful. When you know how to apologize about something whether you are correct or incorrect it only means that you value more the relationship that you have with that person. That is why you can set your ego aside. Do not ever let your ego destroy your relationship. Apologizing might be hard to do but it is worth the shot if it can save the relationship and when someone says sorry to you for their mistakes do not look down on them because it only means that might be hard to do but it is worth the shot if it can save the relationship.

they value their relationship with you and set their ego aside.

Most relationships and marriages are killed by selfishness, neglect, lack of consideration, lies, and secrets

When it comes to survival of relationships, it has to be the initiative of both partners

When a relationship or marriage becomes dysfunctional, You have very few options.

You stay in it the way it is and continue crying with no end in sight, You stay, try to fight to change things for better but remember you can never change another human being if they are not willing, Or you choose you, let go and move on and be happy may be even open your heart again for a better relationship and partner, I must warn you though, it takes a lot of courage and that's the sole reason My husband and I wrote this book.

THE TEARS

We may not know you, but we know what you're going through. You see, you belong to a society no one wants to be part of. It's a society littered with heartbreak, regret, disappointment, frustration, anger, stress, sadness, loss, loneliness, and sometimes even secrets. But it's also a society made up of fighters, you, me, and the thousands of other people who struggle with pain born out of life and love.

You find yourself uncontrollably crying. It's not necessarily that your partner makes you cry, but the feelings precipitated from the actions and inactions, words spoken or unspoken that make you feel like a total loser. I'm not against crying. I'm not against letting tears flow when you feel angry, hurt, disappointed or heartbroken, but when it's an every day occurrence, you have to ask yourself why. When crying turns into extreme anxiety, your puffy eyes become a permanent accessory and your friends find you crying hysterically in your car, office, home, bathroom, and at parties

yourself by the amount of strength you find within. You will be brave.

then it might be time to look at your issues critically! To try again, take a break, move on, stand tall, fall apart, give up, give it another go, change your mind.

It's your life, so you have a right to make whatever choice regardless what people around you think is right or wrong. You will amaze yourself by the amount of strength you find within. You will be brave. You'll learn how to once again love and live I promise. I know it's dark and lonely and scary and unfair right now. And I know you feel broken. Not only have parts of you shattered along the way, but this struggle is changing you. But, now is the time to pick up those pieces and build up your life because you are a fighter.

“The most important ingredient we put into any relationship is not what we say or what we do, but what we are.” ~Stephen Covey

“When my marriage was falling apart, I begged my husband to go to marriage counseling with me, and he refused, claiming that it would just cost money and steal valuable time. We were distant and communication had become so hard, he was always busy and away, all my complaints and need to sort things out fell on deaf ears, it was always cold silence between us, I just didn’t know how to get through to him any more without sounding desperate and at the verge of breaking down, a lot of lies were being told in our union, fresh lies to cover the previous ones, I felt alone, unappreciated, unloved and sometimes crazy for wanting this to work so badly.

I kept petitioning until he agreed to go to marriage counseling with me. Then one day, I was in the counselor's office, looking at the clock. He was forty minutes late. I called him but he didn't pick. I called his work and they said he had left hours earlier. I called home, but there was no answer. That night, he didn't come home and didn't tell me where he had gone.

When I saw him the next day and asked where he'd been and why he hadn't come for the counseling session, he just shrugged his shoulders. When I pushed him to communicate, he just shut down.

To fix a machine,
all it takes is one partner who is willing to do some fine tuning.

I kept going for counseling without him, and he grew increasingly distant. I left him a pile of desperate, bitter wordy messages on his phone, trying to share my feelings. I tried talking to him. But most days I barely saw him, and when I did, I no longer felt safe saying what I really wanted to say, which was that I felt desperately hurt that he didn't seem to care enough about our relationship to fight for it. Then the day came when we had planned to go to a retreat we had booked three months in advance, intended to celebrate our anniversary as the year was coming to an end. Getting time off at work was hard and I was very excited about the trip, especially because of how bad things had gotten in our marriage. In my thoughts, this retreat would bring us close, the time together would join us back together, we'd have mind blowing sex, and we'd live happily ever after!

But two days before the retreat, he proclaimed that he was going to be busy with his friends instead of coming to the retreat with me. When I started crying, he told me to "stop being so controlling," which only left me crying even more. My counselor finally told me that my marriage was over, even if we were still living together, that it takes two people fighting for a marriage in order to save it, and that clearly, my husband had uncoupled, detached, disengaged, and disconnected even though he hadn't asked for divorce. It was painfully true. I went to the retreat by myself." Jane narrated with her handkerchief held over her face, she clearly had failed to come to terms with her ordeal and sought a second opinion from us!

Have You Been Betrayed?

I know Jane is not alone in feeling betrayed in this slow, deceptive and painful way. Have you lost a relationship or marriage because someone just stopped fighting for the relationship? Are you still in a relationship with someone who seems like they've stopped caring, stopped loving, stopped investing, stopped showing up every day, stopped paying attention? Do you feel hurt because you still love someone and you're no longer getting confirmation that they love you back?

BROKEN

When your heart is broken, it can feel like the end of the world. No amount of pain has ever felt so agonizing or concentrated. It's like a giant hole was pummeled into your chest, with no hope of repair. ... Our bodies literally rebel being dumped because there's no greater pain than heartbreak.

You cry, you scream, you watch TV, movies and soaps until you've seen every documentary your subscription has to offer and yet nothing seems to smooth your heartbreak or soothe the longing you feel.

When you're heartbroken, you're grieving the loss of an important person in your life and the loss of your dreams for the future that included that person.

yet you feel everything at once.

You see darkness with no light at the end of the

You feel physically ill, you can't think about anything else, you're avoiding your friends, you feel numb at work, you're not taking care of your needs, you're not having fun anymore, you're struggling with,

boundaries, you refuse to date again for the wrong reasons, you're having difficulty with substances, you still can't sleep, the pain and tears won't go away, the pain is endless

Don't judge this feeling.

Heartbreak is a crushing grief.

We feel emotional pain in the same part of our brain that we feel physical pain, it actually feels like it is inside your body. It can create a barrier to experiencing the things we used to love and can feel like deep depression.

BETRAYAL OF DISCONNECTION

When we think about betrayal, most of us think of someone we trust doing something so horrifying that it forces us to throw out every single investment we've so far made in the relationship or marriage.

What's the worst form of betrayal?

Him sleeping with your best friends, maid, relative or even a stranger?

Her lying about where the money went?

He/she not wanting anything to do with you and choosing someone over you?

Someone using your vulnerability against you?

Becoming a detective in an attempt to uncover hard evidence by examining computers, phones, emails or wallet.

All terrible betrayals, undeniably, but there is a specific sort of disloyalty and unfaithfulness that is more dangerous and equally destructive to trust. This kind of betrayal usually happens long before all the vivid, visible pain, differences, tears, separations and divorce. I call it the betrayal of detachment, disconnection or disengagement.

The betrayal of not caring.

The betrayal of letting the connection go.

The betrayal of not being willing to dedicate time and energy to the relationship.

The betrayal of lack of willingness to communicate openly and respectfully.

The betrayal of not being willing to change for better.

The word betrayal suggests occurrences of cheating, lying, breaking confidence, failing to defend us to someone else who's gossiping about us, and not choosing us over other people. These behaviors are certainly betrayals, but they're not the only form of betrayal. If I had to choose the form of betrayal that emerged most frequently from my sessions and research and that was the most dangerous in terms of destroying the trust relation, I would say disengagement.

a relationship, there's always that dull, nagging fear that some day it'll end. No body knows how quickly
"Some day" will arrive, if ever.

When the people we love or with whom we have a deep connection stop caring, stop paying attention, stop investing and fighting for the relationship, trust begins to slip away and hurt starts trickling in.

Disengagement triggers rejection, shame, low self-esteem and our greatest fears like the fears of being abandoned, unworthy, and unlovable. What can make this concealed betrayal so much more dangerous than something like a lie or an

you don't know why you feel so much emptiness and nothingness.

affair is that we can't point to the source of our hurt, there's no occurrence, no noticeable indication of brokenness. It can feel outrageous, sometimes even for the person who is disengaged. You are bound but separating at the same time. The one who is disengaged may not be intentionally aware of it. On the surface, they proclaim busyness and stress, or they deflect or deny the problem is even present.

It only takes one person to disengage for the poison to spread and infect the relationship. Eventually the person trying to engage and seeking engagement from the other will give up. Sometimes this is exactly what the disengager wants. They are passively trying to end the relationship. Other times they are blind to the havoc they are creating and only wake up when their loved one gives them a wake-up call or walks away.

This is why, although not all equally scaled, these forms of disengagements, waiting for that text back, never getting called back, getting ghosted after a successful month of dating or not being heard in a serious relationship — are all persistently horrible acts. The pain is rooted in our inability to pinpoint it, which is harder to process than the logical pain born from cheating and lying.

Unfortunately, in this generation, the persistent use of technology keeps us instantaneously engaged and distant from one another, and disengagement is the order of the day.

Eventually,

“Everything has changed. Take your most basic problem as a single person: When you like someone, and they don’t like you back. Or, take the reverse: When someone likes you, and you don’t like them back. At one point in time, it used to be kind of a weird thing. It was awkward, it was a conversation, it was something you had to deal with. Now, what do people do? Someone likes you, and you don’t like them back? Just pretend to be busy, forever. That’s what people do now. They pretend to be busy forever, and then they conduct this strange psychological experiment where it’s like, ‘How much hope does this person have? How many times do I need to pretend to be busy before they realize this many scheduling conflicts is statistically impossible and something else is going on?”

Regardless of the number of ways we now have to connect with one another, each of form of communication also provides an opportunity to ignore and disconnect from each other.

Through the use of text messages, we can completely cancel on one another person last minute, break up or even worse, never respond.

Disengagement triggers shame, humiliation and insecurity. No one deserves disengagement.

We muster the confidence to put in our all, we choose optimism, and we uphold even the slightest expectations.

There is a lack of respect and a lack of value we feel when someone doesn't even show up or even possess the courage to reject us face-to-face.

I can't offer a solution to this because when we take risks in love, we risk getting hurt.

In spite of that, if you can understand why you're in pain and why it feels like you're drowning in a never-ending pool of feelings, it will help. "When people we love or with whom we have a deep connection stop caring, stop paying attention, stop investing, and stop fighting for the relationship, trust begins to slip away and pain starts seeping in."

One of our clients was going through this sudden drill of overwhelming pain when he wept saying out loud “All I ever asked was for you to fight for me. For you to tell me the truth when you felt something was wrong. For you to just be honest with how you felt about me and you. I wanted us to work. And I think you know in your heart, that I’m telling the truth.

I loved who we were. I loved how we fit into one each others lives. I loved the you who loved me.

I loved who we were. I loved how we fit into one each others lives. I loved the you who loved me. Sometimes I want to get back to how we used to be. To get back to the beginning. I want to go back to cozy nights in, where all we did was listen to one another’s breathing, back to when just being with one another was enough. To when everything was new and fresh. To get back to who we were at the start. You can’t do this to me, not now!”

After a moment of painful silence and sobs, he looked into my eyes and said
 “I sometimes thinkwas I not enough for her? Was I not handsome enough for someone like her?

Was I not wealthy enough for her? Was I too boring, lazy or dumb?

What was wrong with me?" He pulled out his scarf, rubbed the tears off as he gasped for air with eyes dashing around the counseling room as if searching for the right words!

Then started in a very broken tone....."But then I have to remind myself how it all panned out. How it all blew up. No. It wasn't me. And I will not fall victim to those thoughts that erupt in my head. It wasn't me. It wasn't me at all. It was you."

You just gave up. You gave up when I needed you the most. You gave up when I loved you the most.

"You were the one who didn't fight. You were the one who didn't tell me what you wanted. You were the one who didn't give me a chance. You were the one who didn't try. To try to make it better. To try to make it nicer and smooth out all the wrinkles. I gave you every chance. I gave you every second to tell me what you wanted. To tell me what you needed. But you stayed with your lips sealed. You stayed with your eyes on the ground. And then it was all over. And you were gone. You just gave up. You gave up when I needed you the most. You gave up when I loved you the most. You gave me up and you gave 'us' up. For what? I'll never know."

from that person who got up and disappeared is normal even if you technically weren't in a relationship. Remember a lack of reason does not make it your fault, your blame to take or your solution to find.

Realize you may never find any answers, but you'll still be more than okay.

If you get an answer, you might not want to hear it. The truth is life may never provide us the answers we want at the time we want them. But once you can accept this, peace will find you, even if the pain is still alive.

In any loving and mutual relationship, our growth as individuals and the growth of the relationship is dependent on how we connect, understand, and nurture the other — and how they do that for us.

Full and loving engagement involves:
Understanding and embracing the others vulnerabilities, weaknesses, and pain.

Helping and supporting the other to grow beyond those and feel safe and loved.

A willingness to share your own vulnerabilities, weaknesses, and pain.

Active and reflective listening.

Emotionally mature communication and conflict resolution.

Physical and emotional presence.

Proactive efforts to reconnect through fun, play, shared interests.

Proactive efforts to stay connected when physically separated.

Consciously placing the relationship in high priority over work, hobbies, and other life distractions.

Willingness and desire to grow as a person, to seek personal evolution, and to invite the other person to grow and share with you in this.

Willingness to forgive and ask for forgiveness.

Of course much of engagement is personal and specific to the two people involved. You know it when you feel it and see it. You know how it felt at the beginning of the relationship when you were both deeply engaged in one another.

How does it look and feel now?

I invite you to examine your closest relationships — with your spouse, partner, children, parents, friends. Are you fully engaged? Are they? Does the relationship need an engagement infusion?

If you are the one disengaged, don't allow the relationship to wither and risk losing it. Remember why you love this person, why you are grateful to have them in your life. And engage with them again.

If you are suffering from the disengagement of the other, speak to them openly and calmly about it. Without rancor or blame, let them know how their disengagement is affecting you. Ask for their engagement — or their honesty that they no longer wish to sustain the relationship.

If you were left wondering what happened to Jane after she came to meet us for a second opinion about her situation...She is now happily married to another loving, open minded, gentle man (Joseph) who she's been with for three years now. He is one of the kindest, gentlest, most emotionally available men we've ever met. They've found themselves becoming increasingly brave in how vulnerable they are willing to be. It's been profoundly healing on many levels. What we appreciate most about them is that, if they disagree (which they do), they are willing to go there, to communicate, to get pissed, to speak their truth, to open their hearts, to express hurt and whatever else is on their mind. Never once, in those years, has he shut down on her. If anything, she's been the one more inclined to do so from time to time.

it's so easy for you to make promises
while I stay and watch you break them.

She feels safe to share anything with Joseph, and that safety has allowed her to take huge risks, both personally and professionally, knowing that his love for her is not conditional.

EMOTIONAL AFFAIRS

*I*t was a gentle Friday Midmorning when I found out that my husband had been terminated from his job which he had been serving at for the longest time. As our 1 year old baby boy slept in the back seat of my Rav4, I drove up to the nearby pharmacy to buy a pain killer for his fever since I didn't have any money on me. As a stay home mother, my two girls, one boy and I relied on my husband's earnings and savings for survival. I had called his personal line and his direct line at the law firm where he worked to inform him about the boy's health concerns but the calls were unanswered. I somehow kept my composure when I was redirected by a computerized voice to leave a voice mail but the few minutes felt like eternity. My heart raced with adrenaline as I sent a message to his business email address ... and it immediately bounced back.

As the first of his many transgressions, his job loss

came as a blow. But what followed was a series of half-truths, omitted truths and absolute dishonesty. The worst lie came out a few weeks later, just after I'd put our baby boy to bed. My husband sent me a whatsapp message that was meant for another woman, by the names of Ann. When he arrived home, I straightaway grabbed his phone and found evidence of his emotional unfaithfulness. Intimate chats, selfies, nude pictures both from my husband to her, and hers to my husband and plans to meet for drinks at a certain bar after work gazed me in the face." Mauryn broke down as she tried to calmly narrate the reason as to why she urgently booked an individual counseling session to help her decide the future of her marriage.

The classic definition of an emotional affair involves a relationship between a person in a monogamous relationship and another person outside of that relationship that affects the emotional distance, intimacy, and general dynamic within a committed relationship.

For Mauryn, the reality of an emotional affair felt much heavier than that definition at that particular moment.

Seeing the man she married take a selfie meant for another woman felt like a stab to the heart. Reading their intimate conversations made her wonder what else had happened between them.

why it's so easy for you to burn the bridge while I patiently build it for us
to get there.

Visualizing their cheerful giggles over cocktails and expensive food in luxurious restaurants while she was waking up every two hours to feed a newborn felt unconceivable, and honestly, the greatest betrayal she could imagine in her marriage.

“Everyone knows that bringing a new baby home is a game changer. As a mother who had to breastfeed, everything from my hormone levels to my patience levels were pushed to the brink daily. Becoming a mom was the ultimate sacrifice, and I had done it thrice in just five years. For a while, I blamed myself. I wondered if I gave my husband enough attention. I asked myself questions like, Did I cook enough?

Why did I complain about dropping too much house work? What caused the grand division between us?"

"I could have dealt with a one-night stand," a client names withheld in the same situation recently told us. "My husband instead chose to start a friendship with a total stranger who drove to work with him. Knowing that this strange woman held his attention for hours every day while I could barely get him to come to our son's speech days or doctors appointments was a deliberate abuse of my trust that could never be repaired."

Its two years now, she still doesn't know the full extent of the relationship with the first girl, but even after forgiving him, she again caught him doing the same with a different girl at his new job. Now she knows that she's stronger, smarter, and yes, more alert. She no longer takes things at face value and she can smell a lie from a mile away.

When we invited the husband for a couple session against her will, we had seen the depth of pain, hurt and tears she was going through but again she immensely suffered because she had given her whole, the mere thought and memory of betrayal triggered anger, fresh tears and unanswered questions. It's out of this anger that she decided to end her marriage when she later got proof of infidelity. She's now in a relationship with someone who is unpleasantly honest at times and it's one of her favorite qualities about him.

We don't certainly believe that an affair has to end a marriage. In our sessions we say "Affairs can happen in stable, happy marriages, and they often have more to do with a person than a relationship." Affairs can even be liberating ... and in some instances give a marriage new energy.

However, we also explore the tensions than can result from the natural yearning for freedom within us all and the longing for stability that we crave. People look to their partners to fill a broad range of needs, from safety to emotional support. That closeness can put a constraint on the sense of mystery that fuels desire. Some affairs are breakups, but some affairs are wakeups.

You forced me to believe that your love is just a temporary madness; it erupts like a volcano then subsides and burns away into ashes.

"When I asked my husband why he started an emotional affair, he said, "She didn't judge me." To which I instantly replied, "Of course she didn't. She wasn't raising your three children."

The decision to end my marriage wasn't an easy one, but it was the best one I could make for my family. I deserve no less than the kind of real love described in Deliberately selfish: "If he can't handle you at your worst then he does not deserve you at your best. Real love means seeing beyond the words spoken out of pain, and instead seeing a person's soul."

THE “HARMLESS FRIEND”

In an emotional affair, it makes no difference whether the “friend” lives across the country or across the street, whether the discussions are taking place on email or in person. The problem for the partner is that a vibrant and cheerful conversation is taking place on a regular basis with someone else; whole areas of growth, insight, and soulful exploration have come to be located outside the marriage.

I know of one woman who became increasingly uncomfortable with her husband's "friendship" with a work colleague.

You made me realize that staying with someone who makes me question
everything doesn't mean being patient,
It's a waste of time.

At first, the two ran into each other occasionally when they went to get lunch. Over time, they made sure they had their lunch at the same time. One time, the wife decided to go along when it was time to have lunch. Her husband complained afterward about having had to shift back into "regular conversation" with the colleague. When she said his reaction wounded her, he fumed at her for interfering in their "harmless" routine.

The greatest injury comes from these episodes of getting angry at one's partner for feeling threatened, e.g. insisting that the relationship is harmless after a partner has just described immense hurt. Whose reality gets to be respected here? Who decides? A destructive cycle can derive in which the partner's misery is experienced as an accusation or a punishment, with the result that further comfort is sought in this outside relationship. For the hurt partner, there is no dignity left in speaking up. Suffering silently becomes the safest option.

No matter
how good you were together once the other stopped choosing you,
it's over.

Getting out of one of these cycles is tricky. Within the couple, the only person with the power to resolve the dilemma is the person who doesn't want to take a closer look at it. This would require forcing oneself to care more about the partner's suffering than one's own boost, an ever more elusive approach because the "friendship" becomes more compelling over time. The chief motivation for giving up such a recurring and vast pleasure would be to protect one's marriage, but this motivation gets replaced by the much more pleasant intangible frame of standing up for one's freedom and for one's rights as an individual.

The surest way out of this puzzle is honest self-examination:

“Why does this relationship mean so much to me? What would be missing from my life if I let it go?”

The rewards of the “friendship” contain important clues – something to look forward to, feeling deeply understood, filling up a void during a time of transition, the uniqueness of a fresh perspective, the aliveness of a kind of romance. Feeling re-awakened on so many levels is a powerful allure, which is precisely why one’s partner is feeling so threatened.

Unfortunately, through the relentless and uncanny logic of self-deception, the belief that there’s nothing wrong with maintaining this “friendship” will re-assert itself if not countered by a strong and consistent push to follow up on these clues. It is natural to seek the path of least resistance, to choose the course that is far less tireless emotionally.

The term “crazy-making” is helpful in this regard. So long as the partner’s hurt reaction can be attributed to their personal deficits, to making much ado about nothing, then the pleasures of the “friendship” can continue without interference. The partner pays the price in hits to self-esteem and ultimately doubting their own perceptions.

Key insights that are most likely to be avoided by those involved in a “friendship” like this, but once these ideas are reckoned with and discussed with one’s partner, the path out of the negative cycle may become clear:

The “friendship” you have been claiming as a right is making your partner suffer. Decide whether you want to preserve your marriage. If so, it is crucial to stop asserting that this outside relationship is harmless.

Tell your partner that their insecurity is not a personal defect but rather a natural response to feeling shut out of this “friendship” and feeling threatened by it.

Acknowledge to your partner that emotional straying can be just as painful as sexual betrayal, because the barriers that now separate you as a couple are the same – secrets are being kept and certain things can't be talked about freely any more.

No matter how much you want your relationship to be your last, you cannot force someone to stay if they choose to give up on you.

If you are finding something in this “friendship” you are not finding with your partner, talk about it openly. Give your partner a chance to address these missing pieces so that your emotional depth and intimacy as a couple can be rejuvenated. Couples counseling may be necessary for you to express what has been lacking in the marriage and for you both to move into a phase of mutual and respectful growth.

Explain to your “friend” that you need some distance so as to give your marriage a chance to resume its primacy in your emotional life, e.g. that it endangers your marriage to continue building such a compelling closeness with someone else.

Many who have found themselves in an emotional affair have told me they didn't seek it out, but rather that "it just happened." In retrospect, they acknowledge that there were danger signs that they ignored along the way, especially as the contacts became satisfying and more secretive. Increasing secrecy is certainly a red flag. Another is looking forward to the specialness of contact with this other person more than the daily-ness of being with your partner. It turns out that feeling understood on the level of the soul is far more sexy than sex itself. Restoring such excitement to the marriage is the best choice for those who want to go on enjoying the privilege of having a partner throughout life.

CHANGED AND DISINTERESTED.

*L*inder was one of our coaching students; she had gone through many breaking points as far as relationships are concerned. Before properly closing previous chapters, she would find herself already in another relationship.

Linder's last big heartbreak was one of those illuminating discoveries or realization. She had hit such a breaking point and realized, after all the years, that it didn't matter whether one guy was a musician or the other guy was a teacher or the other was a professional painter. She was continually involving herself with men that all possessed the common denominator of emotional unavailability. She also recognized her own-emotional unavailability and began to see the patterns in her dating life, her decisions, reactions and emotional triggers.

Sometimes

This was the first breakup she had gone through where after the breakup, instead of trying to get into the next relationship or make her ex jealous or cyber stalk him or do anything with only the intention of him noticing/reacting, she took the route she had never travelled. This was the route that she had been putting off her whole life. She decided to deal with her pain, tears, take accountability and feel her feelings instead of trying to embarrassingly numb them. She began to deal with herself.

We told her to “Acknowledged the fact that every single pain that she had ever felt was a direct result of a decision that she had made.”

It was very hard!

Can traumatic things happen that you have no control over? Yes of course, but it is your choice to keep what happened alive that proves to be the gas that’s continually dispensed over the fire of your wrath and pain.

Yeah it was hard to admit, but it was so empowering to finally understand and own. Although difficult at times, taking accountability for your part in your own pain grants you the feeling of being back in control, validated and for once, powerful.

It allowed her to see that she had essentially been telling everyone (and most importantly herself), that she had an unlucky fog over her and it was constantly raining but in reality, she was getting pissed on and everyone with a brain cell could see it.

She was complaining that she had a cat and she was upset because the cat was meow-ing and not barking... Cats are always going to meow and she was the one that decided that it was raining and she was the one that decided that she was going to make her cat bark.

She truly believed that she was finding great guys that had so much to offer and If it weren't for her flaws, problems, insecurities, that one time she freaked out, etc., She'd still be getting the same prince that she met at the beginning; the same guy that she knew was her soul mate, the guy that opened up to her, the one that everything made sense with and the one she was comparing everyone else to.

So, why do people change all of a sudden?

Everything in your relationship goes from hot, “makes more sense than anything I’ve ever known!” “You want to be with him/her every minute,” “You see your future with him/her,” “This is my soul mate!” “This is what you’ve been ‘holding out’ for!!” to either suddenly or gradually... ice cold.

And you’re convinced it was that one time at 2am where you were too needy and asked too much of him or freaked out because you thought he was lying about where he was or you wanted to have a talk to take your relationship to the next level and that was what set him off into withdrawing.

Let’s see if any of this is familiar:

Any bravery that once was, is gone. You feel like he’s not really “pursuing” you as much as he did in the beginning.

You feel like every time you reach out to him, you’re bothering, disrupting or interrupting him.

You're abruptly getting a great deal of justifications from him that are logical and make just enough sense to make you second guess who you are and every last detail of your behavior that could have "triggered" him.

He gets angry, annoyed and seems like he's on the brink of leaving you when you kindly bring up how much you miss him or when you ask something of him.

You can sense and feel him pulling away from you even when he's right next to you.

When people "change" suddenly, you have to understand that you will never be able to make sense out of it, so stop wasting your time. It's insane and no good sense can ever be drawn from insanity.

People don't change. Over time, they reveal themselves.

There is nothing that you could have done that would have so much influence that it could make your "soul mate" go from loving and respectful to a disrespectful loser.

Emotionally unavailable guys always start out by proving to you through their actions that they have the capacity to be everything that you ever wanted. They'll talk about how they see a future with you, but never really do anything to act upon it. When the relationship naturally takes a new level or when it comes to a point where more is asked of him, he needs to be responsible, accountable, etc., he pulls the rug from under you by withdrawing suddenly and without clarification. And because he knows that you are broken and validation hungry, he banks on the knowledge that you will view his withdrawal as something you must have caused by simply not being good enough. Once you're at this point, he can pretty much do whatever he wants and just like that... everything is on his terms and you're a professional doormat.

should be as natural as breathing.
Don't ignore
your instincts.
Be with someone who values you completely

There is no point in trying to make sense of, fix or “not abandon” someone that has changed, withdrawn and is disrespecting you by failing to explain why.

Realize that it doesn't matter if this guy gets married tomorrow, becomes the most philanthropic man to ever grace the earth. He will always be incapable of having a genuine emotional connection with anyone, himself being first on that list.

Don't allow someone to be inconsistent.

The second that you do, you teach them that you're happy with the crumbs they throw at you. Stop being avoidant, stop living in delusion, address your low self-esteem and ask yourself why you don't feel like you're good enough to have a respectful and mutual relationship with yourself, let alone other people.

“If you don't expect too much from me, you might not be let down,” in real life.

So why did he just suddenly change? Because that's what people of the emotionally unavailable type do.

Start treating yourself better, raising your own bar and you'll eventually stop taking what he does so personally.

PLEASE DON'T LEAVE ME!

*The Most Painful Things About Losing The Person
You Love! What happens when love falls apart?*

Romantic relationships don't always last forever, no matter what the movies and songs tell you. Sometimes love just falls apart. Sometimes people leave without ever saying why. It's always worth taking inventory of what it feels like when something as huge as a breakup happens in our life. By doing so, we recognize the universality of the experience and that can lend us just enough assessment to make us remember that we are never really alone.

The initial shock, even if you're the "dumper" in a breakup, the sudden realizations that immediately follow the breakup can be crippling. You may suddenly feel like you've just made a terrible mistake, or, if you've just been dumped, that your entire world has just been turned upside down.

Have your own life. Make yourself happy. Don't rely on someone to make you happy. Enjoy spending time with yourself. Have self-fulfillment.

The small things can be the most painful. You realize that you won't be texting them later to see what they're doing tonight. You realize that they won't be kissing you goodnight. You realize that this is it: no more inside jokes, no more notes left under the pillow, no more "I love yous." The shock of it never comes at once, but in waves. Just when you think you've gotten used to it, something comes along to remind you.

The realization that you cannot be comforted by the source of your pain. Chances are the person you've just lost was the person you turned to for a majority of your emotional comfort. The sudden awareness that you can't call them and be comforted is made even worse by the fact that the reason you can't is because they are the ones who've hurt you. So you turn to your friends, but you know that there's nothing that becomes quite as old as quickly as someone else's grief and there's not really any comfort in hearing someone tell you that he or she doesn't deserve you. And that sucks.

Wondering why is the question that is at the tip of your tongue, even if it never leaves your mouth. "Why?" is one of the most painful parts of a breakup and there's no answer that will satisfy you, no answer that could ever really reason away the pain you feel and the insecurity that you're left with. You wonder if it was something you did, something that you could change if they would just tell you. You wonder if they betrayed you, and if they did, how they could do that to you because you'd never have done that to them. You wonder why they seemed so perfect. You wonder why they'd throw away what you had together. You wonder if they ever really loved you.

You could bend for them, but don't ever break the rules you've set to protect yourself. Be wise, every single time. Some people are manipulative and love to play the victim.

You might feel stupid or ashamed, as if it's your fault for loving someone so much and being hurt so badly. Don't. It's not your fault. Sometimes love just falls apart.

Wondering if any of it was ever true, ever real. It's natural to wonder if any of the time you spent with someone you're no longer with was ever what you thought it was. A breakup will leave you wondering if their affections were sincere, if they meant what they said, if they ever really loved you.

After all, at some point, all lovers dream of a future together. Where did the dream go?

It feels like the person you loved has mysteriously transformed into someone you don't even recognize; like your significant other has died and been replaced by some cruel person who has done irreparable harm to your heart. They're a stranger now and worse, they treat you like one.

If you live together, you're now suddenly faced with the horridness of either having to move or having to watch them move your stuff or their stuff. In the midst of this, all you can do is steel yourself. You try to become as hard as possible. You try to maintain your dignity as the boxes pile up and you go through your relationship's business inventory, the dishes, the books and appliances – as you're hit with the realization that your love has just been reduced to life at its most ordinary.

Alternately, you may only be faced with the pain of having your beloved reclaim his sweater or come by to pick up the things she left in your apartment.

Her hair no longer on your pillows.

His toothbrush no longer by your sink.

Her perfume no longer lingering in the air.

His shirts missing from your closet.

That stuff hurts. When it's said and done, you're freshly and acutely aware of the space that their stuff has left behind. You're reminded again of the space that they've left behind in your life. Put the pictures away. Buy new dishes. Take long showers. Pamper yourself. Grieve at your own pace. Loss moves at its own pace and you cannot control it.

Social media; If your relationship was "Facebook official," there's the pain of suddenly being publicly single, but worse than that, there's also the irresistible urge to see what your ex is up to and to search for clues that might explain your devastation. Are they dating someone else? What about that girl at his work: Is she responsible for this? There's nothing you want to see there. Unfollow them. Don't pick at the scabs that is trying to form over the wounds or you will scar yourself. Don't announce your agony on your Facebook status or Twitter. Hold onto whatever you can of your dignity.

The insult added to injury with “...but we can still be friends.” At some point, your feelings toward your ex – and you’ll get used to saying “ex” to yourself – go from longing and pain to anger and hostility. It’s your heart’s way of self-preservation: anger is more useful than despair. Friendship and romantic love exist on two separate planes and it’s hard to make that transition.

If your ex says that they still want to be friends, the hope for it decreases exponentially because it feels like such an insult.

Your broken heart wants to know how love, which is obviously a giant lie told by people to destroy others, still exists in the world.

You see happy couples doing all the cute things that you were just doing a few months ago and you think “it won’t last” or “I hate them.” You read about falling in love and you wonder how anyone can believe in it anymore and who are these people announcing their relationships and engagements on Facebook? Don't they know that the world ended?

After all, love only leads to pain, right? That's how it feels. Love itself is at fault.

Feeling like you're destined to be alone forever. No matter what your friends tell you about how it's your ex's loss, a breakup leaves you feeling like you might be better off joining a religious order, becoming a nun, taking a vow of silence, or moving to new areas to show your ex that you don't need them; that you don't need anyone.

Your well-meaning friends will bombard you with platitudes about "plenty of fish in the sea" and "getting back out there," and so perhaps you give in.

It's worse if you start dating too soon. You find out very quickly just how lonely dating can be. There's something about the thought of going through the whole "getting to know you" process that makes becoming a monk or nun seem like a perfectly reasonable alternative. Did you really just lose two hours of your night listening to some guy wearing a river of body spray talk about himself and chew with his mouth open? Did that random guy really just try to hit on you? Really?

It is perfectly reasonable to spend date nights with a pile of movies and a bottle of wine.

Love is resilient, our fragile species would have died out a long time ago were it not for nature wiring our brains for love.

Just when you think that your heart has finally solidified into an impenetrable, love-proof fortress that dedicates every effort to the office and the gym...Love will find you when you least expect it.

EXCUSES

Once had a client who was a genius when it comes to excuses. She was unbeaten. No one could make up an excuse quicker than she could. She would even make up excuses for the excuses in her dating life. Her favorite excuse was the “busy” or the “a lot of things going on” excuse. “Busy” was a great excuse because as long as she was too “busy” or he was “busy,” that not only meant that they had stuff going on which was admirable, a total ego

beautiful/handsome, and

increase and accountability eraser, but it also justified having to put off commitment, having to show up, having to align words with actions and having to deal with the truth which was always painful when stripped of all of the excuses.

She was more comfortable making excuses for the guys she was dating than actually feeling the temporary pain of getting real with their behavior and moving on with her dignity in tact. She learned the hard way that the level of excuses made in a relationship whether they be excuses you make for yourself or for others, is directly related to how healthy the relationship is.

I think the older you get, you look for those who can comfort you and be there for you as opposed to someone you can have fun with or just kill time with.

Excuses are tough because when you're wanting a commitment or just the validation/reassurance from him that you both are on the track to commitment or that you both feel the same way, etc., if you aren't understanding or accommodating to their “excuses” which are delaying your happily ever after they will never refer to them as excuses and they will get angry at anyone who does, you automatically become the uncaring, impatient, immature one that doesn’t understand and that he will all too quickly “need a break” from so he can return to being the “victim” with ‘All women are not loyal’ being the melody to his delusional, self centered life.

Excuses allow people to “buy time,” waste your time and use you while you “wait” for them. Excuses devalue having to keep your word, follow through, commit and actually be accountable. Excuses allow losers to continue being who they are and do what they do while still being able to portray themselves in a positive light due to their admirable “excuse” of the moment.

Excuses are a cheap way of avoiding conflict, accountability and having to deal with issues. So why are you a magnet for people who emit out excuses with the ease of breathing air? Your relationships will always reflect the relationship that you have with yourself. You have to examine the relationship with yourself. Do you make excuses for yourself?

We attract what we exude.

If you continually make excuses for yourself and/or others, you will always be a person of inaction. Excuses make everything seem so much more impossible and complicated than it really is so that you get clouded by all of the excuses and never really do anything because as long as stuff is “complicated,” you have a perfectly justifiable reason to “stick it out” and not take action because you don’t want to face what your gut already knows.

The worst is when you start to make excuses for the other person’s excuses.

A friend remembers her epiphany with excuses came when he was dating a successful lawyer that was perfect in every way but had an excuse for everything. She was the woman that was so “busy,” Liam oftentimes felt inferior. No one he knew was that busy. No one he knew was that unlucky to have so many ‘emergencies’ repeatedly come up. After hearing her blame her “busy schedule” countless times, he hit a wall.

He always thought she should be more understanding, “She is a busy lady” until he started to realize what he knew all along but could never admit: She wanted all of the benefits of a relationship; a date when she needed one, a hookup without having to put forth any effort, open ears that would listen to her, etc. but she didn’t want to actually have to show up, be accountable, responsible and be in a relationship with him.

Thank you for teaching me that no matter how hard I try to change myself to please someone, they can still reject me.

It was so hard for him to face the truth because it refuted everything she was telling him that she wanted. So, he just assumed that there was something wrong with him.

He finally got the courage to communicate to her that he knew she was a busy lady, but that this wasn’t going to work because she clearly doesn't have time for a relationship. That was the first time he had ever rejected anyone's behavior and although he was alone, his self-esteem grew because he had empowered himself by walking away from behavior that made him feel bad. Excuses hide truth that people are too avoidant and scared to directly express. People may not agree with what you have to say, but they will always appreciate honesty. There is a difference between being brutally honest and being kindly honest. There's never a need to be brutal in your honesty. Be real with yourself first and never think that you "did" anything to cause someone to make excuses so that they could withhold having to give you the relationship that you deserve. You're beautiful. Don't change.

People have all kinds of different reasons for wanting to end a relationship. Sometimes they're just too busy to juggle a relationship with everything else they have going on in their lives. Sometimes they just need time to figure themselves out alone. And sometimes, people just fall out of love. But out of all the reasons why someone chooses to leave, a recent conclusion according to all individuals and couples we've worked with, we found that, there's one type of rejection that causes the most pain above all: being left in favor of someone else.

One of the hardest things to accept in heartbreak is being left for someone else. Especially when you're in love and are so happy in your relationship.

Thank you for reminding me that people can say we are so 'perfect' together, and then say 'we saw it coming' when it's over.

Where did you go wrong?

Where did you not see that this was happening on the side? Could it have been avoided? So many thoughts and self-doubt creep into our minds in this situation because it's the only way we know how to cope. Overanalyze, figure out how this happened, think of how you sent him running. First of all, it's not you. You didn't do anything wrong except love someone who was much too selfish. You loved someone who loved himself and his own desires too much that he didn't care about yours.

The process involved in mending our broken heart is not an easy one nor does it happen quickly.

Especially when you are left for another . This heartbreak can be devastating. But before you get lost in your sorrow, you need to remember a few very important things. If you've ever been dumped for someone else, you know how bad that type of rejection can feel.

Why Being Rejected For Someone Else Hurts The Most

Rejection stings overall. But people felt the most hurt when they were rejected for someone else. Unlike any other kind of rejection, comparative rejections can leave you with an increased sense of exclusion and a decreased sense of belonging. "Being left for someone else can stir up a batch of deeper, more complex emotions than those that occur after a simple breakup," I keep saying it over and over that.... "Not only is one expected to cope with loss of the relationship, but underlying fears and feelings of abandonment are triggered by the sense of betrayal and of being replaced. This replacement leaves many people feeling like they are disposable, leading to strong feelings of inadequacy, failure, and ultimately shame." I've also realized that not receiving any sort of explanation for a rejection causes a ton of sadness as well. If they couldn't pinpoint an exact reason, they would naturally assume they were left for a third party.

After the shock of finding that they have been replaced, individuals form false beliefs about themselves in response to the rejection as a way of trying to explain what they don't understand. Psychologists refer to these misleading or false beliefs about yourself as cognitive distortions. These cognitive distortions are then reinforced when the mind continues to 'seek evidence,' or examples of how the false thought may be true.

If you've ever been dumped for someone else, it's not uncommon to feel completely down about yourself. Since there's another person involved, the distortion in your head can quickly turn ugly. But there are ways to combat those thoughts. Instead of looking at internal attributions in regard to one's self, people should look at the external attributions that contributed to the breakup. Instead of telling yourself, "It's all my fault. I did it. I suck. I'm not good enough," tell yourself, "The relationship didn't work for these reasons..." If that doesn't work, think back on who you were before this happened. It's important to "revert back to positive cognitive beliefs you held about yourself,” Duke says. Remind yourself about how funny, smart, and good natured you are. Think about all the different amazing things about yourself. “Understanding that the breakup can’t erase the life you had before it happened, will go a long way,” she says. Staying off social media and not stalking your ex are important of course, too. It’s also crucial to allow yourself the time to cry it all out or talk it over with your support system. Above all, know that someone dumping you for someone else is never your fault.

When someone Leaves
You For Someone Else!

It’s important to realize that just because it’s over, your hurt will not automatically go away. It wouldn’t be normal if it did go away so quickly, and I’m here to tell you that it’s okay. You will cry, you will mourn the loss of something that felt so beautifully right. It’s not fair that it ended the way it did, or that you got so emotionally attached and gave your all to a relationship that, looking back and being honest with yourself, probably wasn't the best relationship for you. Cry it out, wear black and mourn, but work through it. Don't get consumed by your grief because it's not worth it.

I deserve.

You're going to miss him or her. His laughter, his touch. You're going to miss the way you were together. How everything was smooth and flowed so easily. How it felt right. In every relationship, even the toxic ones, there is something that makes you stay, something that makes you happy. Is it the way he treats you when it's just you and him? The way he looks into your eyes and tells you he loves you? The way you feel laying next to him? Whatever it is, we always miss something about the person who left us, especially if we don't see it coming or don't understand why it happened at first.

You will feel resentment. It's okay to look in the mirror and wonder why he didn't choose you. You both made each other so happy. What's not okay is to start doubting yourself because he chose someone else. The truth is there was nothing you could have done to prevent him from making that choice, or making your relationship work. Nothing you could have done to make him realize that you were the best choice.

You're going to learn to trust your intuition.

There are signs in every relationship that we choose to neglect sometimes.

These warning signs are our "gut instinct," the feeling that something just isn't quite right. You know these signs because you actively ignored them and brushed them aside. You believed that they were your own insecurity and you didn't want to sabotage the relationship.

a person to change is the biggest mistake a anyone has ever made.

Don't think you weren't good enough. You didn't deserve the way you were left. You didn't deserve the lies, or the constant "I love you's", or all the other verbal nonsense you believed. Don't feel bad that your heart was manipulated , and that he used your love but didn't reciprocate the way you needed it back.

You deserve better. You deserve someone who looks at you, and only you. You deserve someone who is your partner in love, who receives your love and gives it back to you with his whole heart. You don't deserve to be just another choice among others, you deserve to be the only choice. Remember your worth. You deserve it all.

TOXIC

Life has a way of answering questions you didn't even ask. As I reflect upon my adult life so far, I find this to be especially true when it comes to relationships. From being the recipient and the perpetrator of heartbreaks, to intermittently selecting the wrong type, to over expectation, to self-doubt, to romantic bliss... the list is seemingly endless on the ways I have grown in my understanding of relationship dynamics. "I see so much pain from the choices that we have made. So much we would change but can't help but wonder if it's too late. There's a truth that just might save us, love is a language, stronger than hate. Love is forgiveness, it doesn't run away. Love needs no weapon; it is its own defense. In the end love will always win."

the foundation of any relationship

I love those lyrics from Travis green, but again, the only thing that is powerful enough to save us, ends up being the number one cause for the endless tears in the history of humanity.

While we are sure there is still plenty of room for self-sabotage and reflective growth, this is the guidance we are happy to have formed from our experiences thus far. We share this with the hope it will resonate with you, maybe even help.

From personal experience, research and knowledge through the countless number of clients we have encountered in and outside the counseling environment "There are two main reasons people cry: Being separated from an intimate relationship or feeling powerless.

“I shed a lot of tears for the loss of my relationship. However, I shed far more over the sense of powerlessness I felt as my husband called the shots.” One client intimated. She did not see her husband’s controlling ways when she first met him, he was not overtly controlling and as a young girl, she had no concept of the term ‘passive aggressive.’ Didn’t even know that there were different types of controlling personalities.

She thought she had married the most laid back man in the world. What a lesson she learned within months of being engaged and more powerfully once she was married.

She could understand control. She could even understand a need to be in control. She couldn’t; however, understand the need to be in control to such a point one would find satisfaction in the tears of the person he claimed to love. She couldn’t understand the need to be in such control that one would render a person that he loves powerless and helpless. It wasn’t even control. It was bullying, abusive and inflicting intentional pain and heartache. So clearly it wasn't a relationship. Call it one person being controlled by another.

If you are shedding tears because you feel powerless...It's because you have given your power to someone who cannot be trusted with it.

I'm pretty sure
it's not all bad.
Just thank them
but don't dwell
on it

My client kept crying, "I wish someone had told me this. I wish someone had told me to take off my blinders, stop making excuses even once for a man that made me cry. I wish someone had told me to grab my box of tissues, wipe my mascara off my face, and look into a mirror. Look hard at the face that man created so I could see that love was not staring back at me. That a man who had low self-esteem was never going to do anything except try and remind me he was powerful even if watching a woman cry at his hands was necessary to do so."

EMOTIONALLY UNAVAILABLE.

It seems like some people's entire existence is always clouded by thinking, obsessing about the last guy or lady they went on a date with, their last heartbreak, their ex, the chick their ex had cheated on them with, their ex, cyber stalking them, the drama with their current partner or daydreaming about this transcendent "prince or princess."

Susan, one of our clients had gotten to a point where she felt more alone in her relationship than she did when she was physically alone. Her face had started to breakout terribly, and she remembers going to a skin expert to help her with her skin. After examining her skin, the doctor said: "There are so many treatments out there and medications that I can prescribe, but they will only temporarily fix the problem until your skin gets used to it and then you'll have to find the next thing."

how much you want your relationship to be your last,
you cannot force someone to stay if they choose to give up on you.

"So what do I do?" she asked, "I don't want to just fix the cosmetic problem. I'm sick of this! I want to get to the root of it! I'm going crazy!"

"Well, your skin is a window to what's going on the inside, Susan." The doctor explained. "Our skin is our largest organ and it's an indicator of your overall state of well-being." She realized that the same thing that was going on with her skin, was going on in her life.

The guys that she was habitually involving herself with were no different than taking acne medication. They masked the problem for a while; so well that sometimes she forgot there was even a problem to begin with until the problems, the drama, the heartbreak, the devaluing, the emotional unavailability, the deception, happened.

Again and again.

So how did she put an end to it and how do you stop attracting and feeling attracted to emotionally unavailable guys and start attracting emotionally available guys that will treat you the way that you deserve to be treated.

No mind games, no guessing, no excusing?

Here is what we taught her and that when applied, she started to find and attract better, emotionally available men into my life:

Make the commitment to get behind you. Identified triggers that activated your helpless, younger self and make a concerted effort to acknowledge and deactivate those triggers. Remember, if it isn't an issue or an insecurity for you, no one can come along and activate it. Realized that you are dating guys that are either your mother, your father or someone that hurt you. You subconsciously do this as a way to go back, revisit the scene of the crime and convince yourself that if you could obtain validation and unconditional love, that would invalidate the pains of your past. Come to peace with what was and empowered yourself by owning the fact that you now have a voice. You are no longer a scared little girl who needed other people to tell her that she was worthy.

something that isn't meant to work out in the first place.

Realized the importance of being confident and started to rebuild your nonexistent self esteem by instilling some boundaries. We tend to pick ourselves apart. Yes, it's great to care about your looks, but I decided to start caring about being interesting and confident just as much as I had always cared about keeping my body in shape. Get a life. Become someone that you respect; someone that you would want to be with. Do this by creating small goals and sticking to them. Also realize that you are looking at your past relationships from the wrong angle. Yeah, you may have been lied to or cheated on but realize that it had nothing to do with you and that the only way that the relationship would ever have worked was if it was on his terms. Each time you start to reject bad behavior and embrace being treated well, your self-esteem begins to grow because you are making decisions in light of your new found self respect.

Start treating myself better. Realize the most insane thing of all: You are attracting people that are treating you poorly, but guess what they are treating you no better or worse than you are treating yourself. When you commit to forgiving yourself, to being kinder to yourself and to treating yourself better, the people in your life that treat you poorly will give up their battles, they will lose interest and the right people will start to come into your life because since you are treating yourself with love, respect and value, you no longer have the time nor the desire to be around anyone that treats you worse than you treat yourself. Treat yourself well.

Stop people pleasing and blaming yourself. People pleasing is one of the worst ways of being. What other people think of you is nothing you need to concern yourself with. Not everything is about you.

Let go of your need to be needed. You know how most people in happy relationships say "It all happened when I wasn't even looking or wanting a relationship?" That's because when you let go of your need to be needed, you will start attracting people who want you, not people who need you and use you. The desperation vibe will evaporate because you will begin to communicate through your actions that when you go after something, it's because you want it. You already provide yourself with all that you need.

Yes, chemistry is important but realize that a lot of the electric "chemistry" and "passion" that you experienced in your past relationships, was just you seeking validation. Begin to live life on your own terms and the people in your life now are icing on a cake that's already good to begin with. Icing is great, but it's inedible if it's on cardboard.

STRUNG ALONG

The majority of peoples dating life can be described as them being strung along and waiting with teary eyes and bitterness for that special time to come when they would finally get the relationship that they've always dreamed of. This means you waiting around for the guy to become available, you waiting for him to "come to his senses" and you waiting for him to realize that all this time he was looking elsewhere and messing around, yet you were "the one"

Many can never admit this to themselves but looking back, your actions basically translated to every guy that you were “waiting for them”

“It doesn’t matter what I say that I “won’t put up with,” you know that I’m always going to be waiting and here for you because no matter how poorly you treat me, you know they’ll realize one day how much you’ve put up with and how much you love them. You’re going to be there waiting for him to transform into the emotionally available prince that you have to prove to yourself and everyone else that you’re capable of being.

I hear ladies almost on a daily pleading with guys “Please tell me that you’ve made up your mind about wanting to be with me.” “I know that you’re out there looking for the next best thing, but when you realize that I’m the one that’s been here all along, I’ll be waiting, ready and available for you. Always.”

“I love you more than I love myself. Please tell me my worth. Please give me an identity. Please validate me.” And the list goes on and on and on...

.I know that they are not alone in this. You may not think or care to admit that you know, but your gut knows when you are being strung along.

So is there a way to stop being strung along?

Is there a way to stop waiting around for your ‘opportunity’ to live your happily ever after and start living now?

Waiting around for someone to validate you and your worth from a Call, Text, Instagram, Facebook, Snap chat, Email, etc. is a slow and eventual murder of your self-esteem and without your self-esteem, you will always look to others to give you worth and value. Always. Unavailable guys are all too willing boundaries up;

if they still hurt
you, move on!

to accommodate because just like desperation, they can smell a backbone-less, timid girl from a mile away that will put up with their unavailability, not “pressure” them into anything serious and that they can string along and still use for favors, money, an easy hookup, a shoulder to lean on and a mommy.

If this sounds familiar guess what? You're living in the land of delusional limbo and your cheapening who you are at the same time. It's kind of like going on a holiday with friends and instead of going out and enjoying the food, shops, the spa, and the shows, you spend all of your time at the casino playing this one slot machine. Your friends

everything
you had...all of your money, emotions and happiness
into a game in which the house will always win.

tell you to give it a rest but you cant and have convinced yourself that the second you leave and "give up," is when someone else, someone much less deserving, is going to sit down and win your prize. So what happens? You never win the big prize, you're broke, your friends have all given up on you and the holiday is over. You've wasted your time and feel worse than you ever did before you sat down to play. But there was no convincing you otherwise while you were playing. You were in a dream, so focused. You put everything you had...all of your money, emotions and happiness into a game in which the house will always win. Substitute the slot machine with a loser. Waiting around for someone to “be ready” or “change” isn’t love. It’s a vast waste of your time. When you wait around for and continually excuse someone that disrespects you, they’re never going to view your dedication to them as:

“Wow! I’m so lucky! Look at how much of an unavailable fool I’ve been and look at this gem in front of me! I see it all now. She has put up with so much crap from me; I’m so lucky, she loves me so much. Nooooooooo. He’s going to think: “I can use her for an easy hookup when I want, she puts up with my conduct, she helps me out and I can do whatever I want in the meantime. She can’t have that much self-respect if she keeps putting up with what I’m doing. There is nothing to chase because she’s always there. I’m bored. While he pursues and gets the number of a girl with fake hips and tits around the conner.

REMEMBER!

Allowing yourself to be threaded along does not decipher to you nor anyone around you that you are being “selfless,” “patient,” “admirable,” and that you are a “keeper” or a “good catch.” it deciphers that you suffer from denial, validation-seeking delusion and have zero self-esteem.

Be the self-motivated character in your own life, not some waving, hesitant, terrified, and avoidant. Believe and own the fact that you deserve better than being threaded along and waiting around for someone to change, make up their mind, “have space,” have “time to think,” get clean, get help, grow up, etc. Even if he asks you with a million roses to “wait” for him, set your boundaries and remember that you need to value your own time and have your own back first.

“But I don’t know if I’m really getting strung along. It’s complicated.” Yes. You. Do.

Your intuition knows and you know because you feel messed up, crying all the time more than you feel happy. I realized that 150% of the time that people were being threaded along and waiting was because they were so afraid of failure and so damn scared of being rejected again. When the right guy comes along ...yes, they exist; you will both choose each other.

Anyone that asks you to wait for them or that threads you along does not value, respect or love you enough, yet they are all too comfortable with keeping the happily ever after door open just enough for you to have hope and stay while they use you for everything that you do for them and for an easy hookup with no effort having to be applied on their part.

Stop waiting for life to “happen” when someone changes and start making changes within and turning inward. Try to figure out why you allow yourself to be threaded along by guys that waste your time.

When someone continues to hurt you,

relationship.
It really is that simple.
It matters not who they are.

REINVENTING FOR HAPPINESS

*H*earthbreak is a hard thing, but it's not a forever thing, and you will experience an unpredictable amount of it when you're young.

While you're moving from relationship to relationship, working on finding the person with whom you'll stay long-term, you'll have to cope with not just one but often a string of losses and heartbreaks. The repetitiveness can begin to create a learned helplessness: it just seems like your heart always gets broken, you never find the right person, or nobody is quite good enough for you. But this is just a temporary thing. Chances are, you will spend the rest of your life with someone whom you are happily coupled. You are not meant to be stuck in this back and forth. You are not designed to forge a beautiful connection with someone and then have it dissolved. You are not supposed to

are so focused on what you think you have lost that you're not realizing the fertile ground that is in front of you.

build foundations and then have someone crack them in half. This is why it feels so wrong, so foreign, and so awful: this is not how you're supposed to experience life, and it won't be how you experience life for the majority of your life.

Right now, the pain is making you feel like just because someone will be out of your life forever that the hurt will last forever too. But all you can see is what you've lost. You have yet to see what you're going to gain.

Right now, life is offering you a second chance. It's telling you that the person you're hung up on is not the person you should be spending every day of your life with. Your life partner is someone who shapes you forever. Their influence in your life will do a great deal in making you who you become.

Is the person you are mourning the kind of person you want to be? Would you want to have kids just like them? If the answer is in any way no, you do not want to be with that person. In a few years, you'll look at them and want to fall to your knees with gratitude that you were rerouted

Not that you feel that way right now. Right now, you are so focused on what you think you have lost that you're not realizing the fertile ground that is in front of you. The earth shifts when our hearts break. When we are forced out of comfort, we transform. Right now, you have a choice: you can put all of your energy into throwing tantrums about not getting what you want, or you can take all of the energy that you were previously spending loving, caring, worrying, spending time with and thinking about this person, and you can put it into yourself.

Do you know what you can do when your energy is exclusively your own? Anything! Everything! You can start a side hustle and work until it becomes your main thing, that's what I did and by this time next year, you could be self-employed doing what you love every day. You can spend your days and nights reading and retaining knowledge that will literally change the entire quality of your life for decades to come. Am a living testimony that this and much more can happen.

You can spend the money you were wasting on drinks and food and accommodations and start paying off your debts so you have fewer responsibilities and more freedom.

You can become exactly who you want and are meant to be. You have the rest of your life to be in love. You have right now to change yourself.

You're mourning the loss of an idea. It is normal and healthy to grieve the loss of someone with whom you used to have a deep or intimate relationship. But when it becomes obsessive to the point of being devastated and completely incapable of moving on, it is no longer the person you are mourning, it is an idea you had about your future life.

When you break up with someone and mourn the loss of their presence in your lives, it's normal to feel lonely, for emotions to come in waves, to cry, to want to avoid them or start over or take some time for yourself. But when you break up with someone on whom you were in some way relying on to give you a sense of certainty, direction or security for the future, the reaction will be much more agitated. You'll be obsessive, convinced that it's not the end, desperately looking for "signs," doing anything to make them believe you are still meant to be together.

You can start a side hustle and work until it becomes your main thing.

That kind of reaction is not the reaction of someone who has loved and lost a person they care about. That is the kind of reaction of someone who has lost a feeling of safety about the future and will go to any length to get it back... even just believing in their own minds that it's "not over." In that, you are giving yourself that feeling again.

Here's a litmus test for you: what was going on in your life when you first got together with this person? Before you were in this relationship, did you know where your life was going? Were you confident in who you were, what you wanted, and how you were planning to proceed with the next few years of your life? Were you at all worried, stressed or anxious that you hadn't found a relationship by the "right time," or that you'd hit some milestone and be alone? Were you feeling lost in your career, stressed about money, or tense about your family?

The circumstances that existed when the relationship began can tell you so much about the relationship itself. This is why I wrote DELIBERATELY SELFISH a guide to self respect and confidence to live life on your own terms! to “Love Yourself First” when two people who are happy, well adjusted and pursuing their own individual goals get together, the relationship lasts. When two people who need a lot of self-work to do get together, they use one another as a Band-Aid, and then it falls apart because ultimately, they realize another person is not a solution.

If you are anxious about the future, you need to be the one to make a plan.

If you feel unsure about what you want, you need to sit down and brainstorm until you come up with some ideas.

If you don't know who you are, you need to do some soul-searching.

If you feel unsatisfied, you need to work somewhere new.

If you feel stressed, you need to manage your time, money or relationships better. This is what you needed to do then, and it is what you are getting a chance to do now.

You're not going to forget about this person. You're going to have to get distracted.

"You are standing in the ruins instead of building the new city."

It means that for all the time that you are spending focusing on what's gone, lost and failed, you are offering more and more of your energy to tearing apart the ruins. The city is already collapsed. You're standing in heaps of debris kicking at it and wondering why it's not magically returning back to the heart you once knew it to be. If you want to change your life and really get over this person, you will have to start building the new city, so to say. You will have to start offering your energy not to what's passed, but to what's to come.

"Forgetting" about someone is impossible. The more you try not to think about them, the more you will. Carrying on with your days like nothing has changed is not what it's going to take to "move on” with your life. The normal that you once knew is gone. If you keep trying to live as though this person is still around, you will be circling around empty spaces. It will be impossible to not think of them and mourn for them constantly. You will sit in the room you used to sit in together and cry. You’ll visit the places you use to shop in together and feel defeated. You’ll see the friends you used to hang out with and sense embarrassment because in a very public way, you failed.

You need to get up, you need to start over, and you need to begin anew. You need new places, people, and routines. You need new adventures and goals and plans.

You will have to start offering your energy not to what’s passed, but to what’s to come.

This is how you get over anything: you fill your life with so many powerful, world-altering things that slowly, over time, you begin to think about them less and less. Not because you’re trying to, but because you have so many other things to think about now. You have so many places to go, things to hope for, and passions to keep your mind consumed.

As time goes on, you'll think about that person less and less and less. Not because you magically stopped caring about them one day, but because you started filling your life with things you cared about more.

That, right there, is the magic of heartbreak: it forces you to be a different person. Unless you want to mourn forever, you have to change. And if you do it right, you'll work on becoming the person you always wanted to be. You'll look back on this moment as the peak, the turning point, the unanswered prayer that was the answer itself. It will be the greatest thing that ever happened to you because instead of a lukewarm relationship that wasn't working anyway, you got the life of your dreams... and you were the one who gave it to yourself.

When someone is right for you!

The tricky thing about relationships is that they almost never end with certainty. It's not obvious that you should or shouldn't be with this person. For every issue that you have, you could list off all of their redeeming qualities. For every argument, you could rattle off all the great times you had together, all the signs and signals and ways

You'll look back on this moment as the peak, the turning point, the unanswered prayer that was the answer itself.

you're positive that you're just "meant to be." The opposite of knowing someone is right for you isn't being sure someone is wrong for you. The opposite of knowing someone is right for you is being uncertain.

When someone is clearly and overwhelmingly "wrong" for you, your relationship won't get that far. You won't be able to develop and foster any kind of significant connection. You'd realize that you are basically incompatible long before you could form any kind of attachment. This is not how heartbreak happens. It is not the product of being mismatched with someone who is fundamentally “wrong.” It is being matched with someone who in many ways could be “right,” but raises just as many doubts. Realizing that someone is wrong for you happens in tiny gestures.

It is not posting a lot of photos online, because somewhere deep down, you know the relationship isn’t going to last.

It’s avoiding introducing them to your parents, because you know they aren’t going to react as well as you’d hope.

It’s thinking to yourself in quiet moments, “But what if there’s something else?”

It’s daydreaming about the possibilities that life could hold if you weren’t with that person.

It’s going back and forth wondering if this is the person you could spend your life with, rather than just being in the moment each day and actually spending your life with them.

Heartbreak doesn't happen with people who are wholly wrong for you. You aren't able to get close enough to let it hurt. It happens with people who are just right enough to make you hope, but just wrong enough to prevent you from getting closer, or making it official.

That's why you don't have to watch out for the people who reject you as much as you do the people who leave you hanging, the people who keep wanting to see you without making a commitment, the people who say it's "just not the right time" or that they "aren't looking for anything serious." The truth is that nobody is looking for anything serious until someone comes along who they seriously love.

It Is Never The Right Time Until It Is The Right Person.

The opposite of "just knowing" someone is right for you isn't "just knowing" they are wrong for you. It's doubt. Being very uncertain means you know the answer... you are just too attached to admit it.

Most people hang onto what they've known and what they think they want because they are too afraid of feeling the discomfort of not knowing.

When You Can't Stop Thinking About Someone?

Everyone around you is going to be advising you to just "let go" of the past, move on, and start a new life. They'll tell you to go out drinking, start dating, and rejoice in your newfound freedom.

This will be annoying at best, and absolutely infuriating at worst. There's nothing more frustrating than someone who seems to believe that a shot of tequila and a random Saturday hookup will be a soothe for the life-shattering heartbreak you're experiencing right now. The future as you thought it would be has changed. The present as you're used to it has, too. You do not need anymore uncertainties right now. You do not need to try to force yourself into a new life when you're already terrified about what's going to happen next.

The harder you try to “let go” and “move on,” the more your brain is going to latch onto reasons why you should think about it more, try again, or keep hoping.

The thing about “letting go” is that it’s less an active choice as it is accepting that something is already gone. It’s not really that you actually dismiss someone from your life, it’s that you come to terms with the fact that they are already gone. In that, you can find a appearance of peace: you aren’t toying with whether or not you should unfasten your hand and release something, you only have to realize that you are already living without this person. They are already gone. You have, essentially, already let go.

People feel uncertainty because it’s the unknown. But uncertainty is also an incredible blessing, because it means that for the first time, you are detached from what happened in the past and what you think you want to happen in the future. When you are uncertain, you are open to making choices that otherwise wouldn't have been possible, because you were too comfortable with what you were used to. Uncertainty is a breeding ground for life's greatest moments and most epic possibilities.

Most people hang onto what they've known and what they think they want because they are too afraid of feeling the discomfort of not knowing. People who are willing to brave that tension are the ones who truly free themselves.

GROUND RULES

*W*hen you're hurt and uncomfortable and desperately wanting to retrace your steps, figure out what went wrong or even try to mend things again, you're going to be in a place in which you are not thinking clearly. Call it a crime of passion, but people are most apt to completely embarrass themselves and make detrimental decisions for their long-term wellbeing when they're most in emotional pain. That's why if you're going through a split, you should follow these guidelines:

- Follow a no contact strategy, unless the relationship wasn't that serious and you're comfortable being friends again. Exes don't hang out alone, go out for drinks, or talk to each other regularly... and they certainly don't hook up.
- Find a trustworthy friend to whom you can vent, and do so privately. Airing your dirty laundry all over social media doesn't make your ex look bad, it makes you look desperate.
- If you can't help but feel the urge to check in on them, to view their photos or to see what they're doing online, unfriend or block them. If you feel bad doing that, explain kindly that it's a step for you to gain closure and to help you move on, and that you wish them well.
- Switch up your routine. You cannot hang out with the same people, visit the same places, and otherwise continue to circle in orbit around them and not expect to miss them every minute of the day. When you go through a breakup, your whole life changes... that's the magic of it.

- Don't do anything permanent. Don't do anything you cannot undo in a matter of days.
- The sooner you can try to start casually dating again, the better. No, it's not fair to enter a new relationship hung up on someone else. But if you are never really going to forget your old relationship until you have a new, better one to take its place and remind you that everything happens for a reason.
- Write down everything that you wanted and needed this person to be for you. Most likely, you're scared because without them, your future could be lonely, financially harder, or you might just feel like a total screw up. Those are all issues that you need to work on mending for yourself. A relationship is not a band aid. Treating it like one is what landed you with the wrong person in the first place.
- Stop blaming them. Maybe it didn't end well. Maybe you actually were a victim. Maybe they cheated. Maybe it wasn't fair. Maybe they promised you forever and then took it back. Maybe they were not the person you thought they were. It sucks, but it happens to everyone. The longer you hold a torch of anger for them, the longer you give them power over you.

- The only thing you are losing is one idea you had about what your future might have been. That's it.
- The other thing you are losing is the life you are comfortable with now, but if your relationship is ending, chances are it wasn't all that great in the first place... at the very least, it wasn't good as it could be, and one or both of you knew that.

PAST AND FUTURE IDENTITY.

*W*hen you're in therapy, a technique that is often used to help heal limiting patterns and beliefs is "inner child work." Basically, it's about tracing your issues back to their origin – your early life – and reawakening your inner child either by teaching them that there's nothing to be scared, or proving to them that they are loved and safe. Inner child work can do wonders in helping you release the limiting beliefs of the past, and to stop re-creating the painful relationships of your childhood because you don't realize you're confusing “love” for “comfort.” But what’s even more significant to help you through this time of transition is prospect self work.

I have seen way too many promising relationships being abandoned prematurely because one or both of them are unwilling to consider the objective reality owing to the reinforcement of their own negative delusions.

Prospect self work is a process of visualizing yourself many years down the line. When you sit down to do it, make sure you’re in a quiet and calm place, and have a pen and paper handy. Close your eyes and visualize the highest and best version of your future self. It doesn’t matter what age you are. Know that it is common to first see scary things (like being dead or hurt or in pain when you’re older) and know that it is just your fear of what could happen that you’re seeing.

Once that subsides and you can finally see what you're going to be like in the future, start asking that person questions, and see what they say in your mind. Know that this is all entirely a projection of who you already are and where you already know you're meant to be heading... it's just a process of making you aware of that fact.

Often, visualizing yourself happy and single or happy and coupled with someone new in the future is just what you need to let go of someone. Your future self could also advise you on what to do in the moment, or whether or not you really need to let a relationship go. You are basically tapping into the direction of the highest and wisest part of yourself which means, better developed) and as long as what you write down feels real, true and helpful, you should trust it.

The reality is that you already are that best version of yourself. Everything that's happening around you right now is helping you to realize that once and for all.

LESSONS LEARNED

Y healthy relationships come from within. Just because you are available for a relationship doesn't mean you are ready for one. If you're not comfortable enough with yourself or with your own truth when entering a relationship, then you're not ready for that relationship. Don't make the other person suffer for your own lack of integrity or inability to embrace the truths of your life.

Heartbreak may mean the end of a relationship, but it's not the end of love. Know this... life is too short to not to allow yourself to love again. People may call you a "hopeless romantic." Be confident in knowing that you can be a romantic without being hopeless. There are good people out there; and that at least one of them is right for you. Don't let your pain, fear, or anyone convince you to settle for less.

The true dynamic of a successful friendship and relationship is when the respect is mutual and reciprocal.

When entering into a personal relationship, be honest from the start. Believe me when I tell you that I know it's tempting to lie and smear the truth, but it never helps. It's simply better to be honest from the start. The feeling of disappointment that comes with the realization that you are incompatible is much better than the feeling of pain and betrayal that comes with finding out that either of you (or both) are full of crap.

For a great love, cultivate a great friendship. Endless love is fueled by endless friendship. If you want to have the greatest romance ever, have the greatest friendship ever. Cultivate it; do not let your friendships die. Remember, it's not a lack of love that destroys relationships; it's usually a lack of friendship.

Be comfortable... but not too comfortable. Sometimes the comfort of being in a relationship lulls you into mundane complacency; you become irrelevant in each other's lives. We call this phenomenon growing apart. Don't let this happen to you. Keep the spark alive. Flirt. Be on your best behavior. Keep interested in each other. Go on dates. Keep the passion going. Express your appreciation. Be a good friend. The true dynamic of a successful friendship and relationship is when the respect is mutual and reciprocal.

Have a funeral for past relationships. Think of how liberating it would feel to have a funeral for past relationships and drama. Take the time to look back and give the past its proper recognition. Reflect upon what you can learn from your experiences; the good, the bad, the pretty, the ugly. Learn and move on. Recognize past relationships for their impact on your life and most importantly, recognize them for what they are... gone. Let go.

someone... feel it, speak it,
show it, be it.
Do more than tell them... show them.

Don't try to control other people's behavior. It is a tremendous burden to attach yourself to outcomes and behaviors you simply don't control. The only control you have is your own behavior; and that's tough enough to control. What chance do you think you have of controlling others? Free yourself from such fruitless stressors. Instead of trying to control the behaviors of others, set a standard in your own life. Refuse to be disrespected, lied to, or mistreated. Set standards of personal behavior and standards of what you accept from others. Setting standards for yourself is a healthy and effective way to avoid the fruitless burden of trying to control others.

We live in a multidimensional world. Don't live a one-dimensional love. If you love someone... feel it, speak it, show it, be it. Do more than tell them... show them. Let them feel your dedicated respect and your unwavering devotion. Ensure that your commitment and passion are known and unquestionable. Show them what they mean to you... what they are to you. And. If you don't feel inspired to show your love in this multidimensional manner... be kind enough to let them go... so they can find someone who will.

Stay alert! Don't let someone's words blind you from their behavior. They can say all the right things, they can make you feel things you've never felt before but don't be fooled; their actions will reveal their true character, desires, and priorities. Behavior speaks; pay attention to what it tells you. Behavior is math; pay attention to what it reveals.

Don't live an on-hold life. Stop just sitting around waiting for "the right one." The love of your life is out there... but they won't just drop on your lap, nor you on theirs... so stop living an on-hold life!

Go out there and experience your life, write your story, and live your fairy tale. It is on that journey that you'll cross paths with the love that's worthy of the story.

THE WRONG HEART

You will never be enough for the person who doesn't love you. Your warmth will never melt the heart which does not beat for you. Your eyes will never see a glimpse into the soul that is searching for someone else. You may be hearing everything you want to hear, but you will not feel it in your bones.

You will always be the one who holds the hug the longest. Their kisses will linger on your lips while yours will be quickly forgotten. You could write a million love letters, but they will never understand the depth of your words. You could explain your feelings in a million different ways, but they will never quite believe you.

Love is not something you have to analyze. You will know when someone loves you. They don't leave when times get tough or feelings get hurt.

Then you will start making excuses. At first you won't even realize you are doing it. The excuses will make you feel better temporarily. You'll tell yourself that they are just too busy. They have more important priorities, so you should be thankful you are at least one of them. It's okay if there's no trace of you in their life, they are just a really private person. Then you will remember that you also have an active life filled with responsibilities and your explanations for them won't make much sense.

Then you will start blaming yourself. You will work harder to prove yourself and your love. You will be the one to apologize first, even if you didn't think you were wrong. You will go out of your way to please them in order to keep the peace. You will stop mentioning things that bother you. You will stop asking them to meet your needs and instead focus solely on meeting theirs.

Then you will be shocked when it's still not enough. They won't suddenly wake up one day in awe of your existence. They won't confess their love and commitment to you. In fact, one day, they won't do anything for you at all. And they never will again. They will leave you without even a goodbye or a single word. Their silence is intentional. It is to remind you that you weren't enough for them and you never will be. You weren't even worth an explanation of their abandonment.

Do not blame them for not loving you. Maybe they thought they loved you, but maybe it wasn't enough.

Love is not something you have to analyze. You will know when someone loves you. They don't leave when times get tough or feelings get hurt. They lean into you. They work at the relationship.

They know losing each other is an unacceptable outcome so they fight to make things right.

This is the moment that you must gather every speck of strength you have left in your body and rise. Do not blame yourself for the heartbreak you're feeling. Remind yourself of all of the wonderful people you have in your life who have supported you through everything.

While being alone sucks, being with someone who never truly loved you is even worse. Focus on all the love you have to give that will one day be appreciated. Regretting a relationship is a waste of time and will keep you trapped in the past. You did your best and that's all you

Good relationships are simply made up of commitment, compassion, and forgiveness. They are created by two people who always show up for each other, even when it's not convenient or necessarily enjoyable. They ride the waves of life together. This doesn't mean there is some perfect person out there floating through the world waiting to meet you and paddle you into your happily ever after. It does mean that there are people out there just like you who are seeking a fulfilling relationship and know that it won't come easy. They have been through enough heartbreak of their own to understand that relationships grow stronger when you choose to stay.

One day you will meet the person that will choose to stay.

HOW TO LET GO, MOVE ON AND HAVE A HAPPY LIFE

*W*hat are some of the questions or thoughts that come to your mind, when someone says, its time to “let go, move on and have a happy life?”

Maybe that person is tired, frustrated, or is simply saying I surrender! I give up! I’ve done enough, but I doubt that any extra effort will yield much! So its time to let go!

A person in this kind of situation may not fully comprehend or understand the magnitude of the decision they are making. But the betrayal, pain, darkness and suspense will push them to act.

In most cases, if you ask them to share their next move or their exit plan, they will confidently respond with “I don’t know and I don’t care.”

Usually, the auto response of “I don’t know and I don’t care” is triggered by a defeated mindset! They are tired and have internally lost the battle.

They will continuously reassure themselves that they are done and can’t stay for another day!

I am sure you have come across people that walk while talking loud to themselves. Usually, they are arguing about random topics or they’re trying to make sense of a situation, they’re at times giving themselves re-assurance or they are reducing their frustrations to something manageable or they are asking questions that have no answers.

In most cases, people are completely blank about the next phase of their lives. They have so many questions, but no answers.

The Hardest Questions To Answer

Questions like; how do I start all over again? Who takes custody of the children? What will my family and friends think? How will I survive without a job? Or we have shared property and businesses, who takes what? What are the chances of losing it all to my partner? Will I ever re-marry? If yes, what are the chances that I will end up with someone worse? No one in our family is divorced, and

I am sure you have come across people themselves.

I promised myself never to divorce, how do I even open my mouth and say I want a divorce? Will my children ever forgive me for this? Will any man or woman accept me with my children?

When a person gets to that place, the questions that linger in their subconscious can potentially halt or delay the decision making process.

Sometimes it feels like you've been running away to no destination. Sometimes, you may think everyone knows about your scandal or what you're facing and they're out-there to judge you.

Hey, you learn to dry up your tears, you face your nightmare; you deal with your deepest fears.

When you can't run anymore, when you can't explain yourself to the world, when you're tired of family meetings where you are invited to be crucified because no one believes in you!

Whichever the situation, you CHOOSE to make the tough decisions! You don't make these decisions for anyone, but rather for you.

Decisions Must Be Made Regardless...

At that point in life, most people are held in a place of indecisiveness because of the thick fog obstructing their vision and lack of clarity about the next phase of their lives.

People get frustrated, disturbed, un-easy and paranoid when they are unable to make decisions about day-to-day life issues. Remember, decisions if not properly and wisely taken, can be disastrous. You don't have all the time, but if you hurriedly make emotional and un-thought through decisions, you may bury yourself and the generations after you.

In a place of no clarity you are robbed of the control. You are not perfectly in touch with yourself or the situation at hand. Most times, you are completely powerless and can hang onto anything for hope.

You are drained, with no excitement, automatically disconnected from people around you, full of pessimistic thoughts and you definitely don't see a way out or a light at the end of the tunnel.

When we get stuck, we cry and feel helpless and powerless because we can't comprehend, envision or handle the magnitude and impact of the decision we are faced.

However, it's important to note that, lack of clarity or the uncertainty about the next phase of your life, does not stop the clock from ticking! Life must continue decisions must be made, the fog must clear, and we must face our fears and address issues as they unfold.

“Stuck, Confused And In Self Inflicted Pain” Peter

“I can’t imagine a life without the mother of my children. After 20years together and at a time when I am supposed to settle down and enjoy our life together, at a time when I must earn the respect of the young generation, community and village. I messed, I was caught in the act! I am in pain, stuck and totally messed up.” Peter mentioned in a very low tone and with tears in his eyes.

As a caring friend, I asked, “What exactly happened?” Peter responded, “I am a dummy! I am a fool! She is right to go. This time I will not stop her, she gave me more than enough chances to reflect and change. But some habits never die! I did it again! I don’t think I deserve another chance.”

Well, it is painful and shameful when people take separate ways. But what do you do, when your Partner’s back breaks, when they cant stand the shame and disrespect from your terrible and shaming habits?

Compromise in relationships and marriage

I think you've heard in several marriage/relationship seminars or in counseling sessions that marriage is about compromise. Compromise works well, when it's reciprocated. When it's shared effort! When both parties are willing to make it work! But it hurts when one party keeps editing their expectations to try and fit in, until they can't edit any more.

You can't love someone that cannot love you back. Well, some people have tried, but they have been disappointed!

I believe in giving each other a chance, I believe in compromise because all relationships go through some rough patches and struggles. But intentional disrespect of another is wrong. Taking your partner for granted is completely wrong.

to be alone.
Because it's so much worse being with someone and STILL feeling
alone."

If your partner can swallow the pride and take you back after messing up, help yourself; don't take them back to the same valley of tears. If you can do it over and over and over, a time will come when your partner will choose not to take the humiliation anymore.

“ It takes a special kind woman to accept an apology she never got, but truly deserves. Its incredibly hard for her to give love a second chance, after she's built walls. With all she has been through, she has decided that the cheap love of her past doesn't define her as a woman. The fact that she is still standing is proof that no man has the right to ruin her idea of love. Her past is ugly, but look at how beautiful she has decided to be.” Joey Palermo

Don't push your partner hard against the wall. Help yourself, become a better person.

How to swiftly walk through decision-making

If you are caught between a rock and a hard place; If you don't know how and where to start. Just know, you are not alone, we've been there before. Let us walk the journey together, let's dig and address your fears.

Understand that decisions are practical, logical and Intentional

After the tears and emotional turmoil, we choose to dry up our tears and sober up.

It is practically impossible to make decisions under the heavy emotional cloud. Even when we try, we make the wrong decisions. A troubled soul is far from a natural connection with self, it can never freely flow or be logical.

When emotions fly high, in the heat of the moment, it is likened to someone that tries to see their reflection in boiling water. You have to cool down first and be logical, focused and intentional.

Talk to a neutral person

A neutral, unbiased party looking from out-in can help you understand your situation better. Sometimes, emotions crowd our judgment. We easily run to the people that will side with us. We need pity more than the truth. Before making a decision, an un-biased assessment of your situation will open your eyes to the problem within a problem.

A neutral person can be a Therapist/Counselor or a genuinely respected member of the community. Some elderly people may not be exactly professional in the way they assess your problem/situation, but they will certainly share their personal experience on how they maneuvered when they were faced with a similar situation.

You're probably wondering why we recommend a neutral person to be the best person to go to, well, they have nothing to lose, they are not in your close proximity, they can't be easily biased or take sides. But as earlier mentioned, it should be a professional or a person of authority and influence in the community.

It is pointless to make lies; the Therapist will guide you basing on what you share with them. Don't get emotional; don't seek pity from a Counselor. If you need help, be truthful.

Engage and be fully involved in defining and assessing the problem

In assessing a situation or problem, we define, analyze and gather all the necessary information needed to come up with solutions or alternatives. While gathering information to make distinctly well-informed assessments about a situation, a Counselor may ask all sorts of questions. It is at this point that most people make lies even when they need help.

Some of the questions a Counselor will ask may not directly correlate with your problem, but it is part of the process. Sometimes people make faces when you ask about their sex life. At times, the triggers to a problem are completely buried deep.

So we don't scratch the surface when gathering information, we ask the least expected questions.

Let us take Peters situation into consideration and pick some lessons about decision-making.

Peter managed to fully define his problem; he also analyzed and tried to gather enough information about his situation. When he was done, he chose to be the jury and verdict! He nailed the last nail onto his coffin. Peter was extremely hard on himself! His situation screamed loud to his face and he quickly judged himself.

What he did not consider was seeking professional help or at least an independent assessment from a neutral person.

Is it possible Peter's wife could have chosen to forgive him and stay?

I think yes!

Peter was remorseful and truly apologetic. Maybe Peter could have gone on a journey of trying to align his apology with some action and with a promise of a timeline to reflect and truly change.

Maybe the wife did not exactly want to throw away the 20years together. It is possible that a neutral person would have thrown more light on the good that kept them together for those 20years.

In our sessions, we usually ask our clients to write down everything good and bad in their last years together. Sometimes we forget to celebrate the good days, but jump so fast and quick to the adversity or challenge at hand. And I can assure you, most times, there is a lot more to celebrate than fight about.

Anyway for your workbook, please do the following when you find yourself in a decision-making crisis.

Before making any decision about the next phase of your life, please do the following;

- Define or in simple terms, write down the situation at hand. Be truthful; don't fool yourself, if you are in the wrong, write it down.

- Find a neutral person to help you understand, assess or break it down for you.
- Be open enough to go on an investigative journey with the help of a Counselor to gather as much information as possible surrounding your situation.
- Be open to alternatives or suggestions recommended by a Counselor
- Be bold to make a decision

LETTING GO

*L*et go and move on is painful, un-bearable, but we face it with courage. It's one way of coming to terms with reality, closing the old chapter, accepting and taking personal responsibility: You stop complaining, or blaming it on others, you embrace calmness, boldness and live in the moment.

People invest a lot in relationships; they invest their money, time, and emotional energy. They create expectations of a family or a life together.

The shared values and chemistry built between lovers or the sweetness and goodness is enough to cause a depression, darkness and tears at the point of letting go. All this emotional turmoil can be likened to the entire world crumbling down on you.

But hey, when it fails to work, when expectations or dreams die prematurely. Does that mean you are worthless? Does it mean you should take your life? Nope! Sometimes, God is opening your eyes to a better life.

in the ring knows the pain of a punch
in the face!
Anyone can judge because they don't understand your pain.

Anyway, at the point of taking separate ways, Much as there is a promise of a better life ahead, pain is inevitable, pain is real, the rough patches as you try to get yourself on your feet again is painful. Letting go or cutting your losses is equally hard. But when a relationship is beyond repair and no amount of salvaging can save it, it is only fair to stop beating yourself up and work on your mental health and well-being.

As I earlier said, a better life lies ahead, but you must be sound and sane to embrace the goodness that is ahead of you.

“Some people believe holding on and hanging in there are signs of great strength. However, there are times when it takes much more strength to know when to let go and then do it” –
Ann Landers

I think you are stronger when you know the time to let go. No one should judge you for making such a decision.

The person in the ring knows the pain of a punch in the face! Anyone can judge because they don't understand your pain. You are the one in the ring NOT them.

It is easy to watch from out and advice or be the self appointed judge. I no longer JUDGE! "I have enough in my own ring."

While watching soccer, spectators will tell you how easy it is to put the ball behind the net. They will assure you that the striker took a weak shot at the goalkeeper. But until you get them onto the football pitch and they will fail to put the ball into an empty net.

Businesses, relationships, partnerships, marriage and any form of covenant/commitment between people can get ugly, toxic and unbearable.

The tears we shed when disrespected, betrayed, abused or taken for granted by the people we love and trust can get us to a place of pain, regret and loneliness.

A partner that does not appreciate or see your value will be self centered, arrogant, manipulative and toxic.

Their language and behavior is detrimental to your self-esteem and confidence.

You cease to live, you only breathe for as long as they deem it fit. You are continually at the mercies of another. Someone is simply doing you a favor! You can only fight hard to fit in. You are caged, suffocating, you cry yourself to sleep daily, with no hope of how things will change.

Several will patiently wait for the change, they will hope against hope that their partners will get to a point and start to appreciate them for their endless sacrifices, but that time may never come.

“Letting go of someone dear to you is hard but holding on to someone who doesn’t feel the same is much harder.”

I remember a woman who came to us crying, she repeatedly said, “My husband is deliberately disrespecting me, he is pushing me away. He wants me to walk away. I am tired, I will leave him in peace, that he may enjoy his life with young girls.”

When the pain is too much, when you cant bear the shame and betrayal anymore. Most Women will seek for any possible exit. At that point, they are tired, they’ve tried and have gotten to the limit, and they can't hold the fire anymore. All their sacrifices are in vain! So they make up their mind to walk away even when they have not considered how they will survive or fund their way.

When your heart has been torn into a zillion pieces and with tones of regrets and pain of giving away your prime age or youth to someone that just used you and walked away when you least expected it.

So it is up to you to wake up from this harsh and ruthless reality and stop loving a person
that's no longer available.

The bitter pill here is, when people walk away, they do it consciously! They deliberately close the door on you.

So it is up to you to wake up from this harsh and ruthless reality and stop loving a person that's no longer available. The earlier you start on your recovery journey, the better.

This may sound disheartening, but they are gone! If they have any plans of returning or if you have hope of them returning someday, it is because they think you are an option! You are their fall back position when things don't work out with their first priority.

When you do everything possible to save your relationship and all your efforts fall on deaf ears, when they intentionally speak out loud in action and words that they NO-LONGER need you, when it is extreme and life threatening. Be selfish and start a life without them. We call it letting go.

Practical ways to follow when letting go

Be sure you it's the right decision

Closing a door on someone that you love or loved does not just happen! It does not come that easy! But you can certainly tell that you're wasting your time, you can tell if they will never change, or if you're no longer needed. You may do a fair evaluation of your relationship. It will immensely facilitate the decision making process. But be clear and respectful, if you no-longer love your partner, let them go.

Learn to self-forgive

Love is for mature people. When adults give their consent in a relationship, it all comes at a cost and with consequences. Breaking up before commitment or after commitment can be one of the un-likely consequences

Anything can happen from the time of initiation of a relationship, to the point of commitment or even after commitment.

But the most important part here is, whatever that goes wrong or right, “You are human, you can error, but you don’t cease to live when expectations die pre-maturely.”

You learn to forgive yourself and open your heart to love and be loved again.

During our radio programs and several speaking engagements, we usually use the phrase “If you are not ready for love, don’t dare, love is for mature minds”.

A relationship can work out or fail, but when it fails to work, we let go with dignity.

The shame and guilt after several years, continuously screams to your face that you are a failure. I remember a woman that burst out in tears saying, “ How will I return to my village? I have brought shame to my family. I am finished!”

It is unfortunate that the African culture judges the girl child for any breakup or failure in a marriage.

A girl child has been told to keep her marriage even when it is dangerously toxic. So the poor girl keeps in the heat to appease everyone, she sacrifices her life even when there is a possible threat to her life.

No Regrets

Stop listening to the voice that points you to what you did wrong or what you could have done differently. You genuinely loved and gave it your best. If it did not work, move on. Sometimes, you just need to be brave to cut your losses and walk away with some dignity.

When the pain is too much, we are tempted to revisit the situation and try to discuss what went wrong, it may seem productive, but it turns out more painful and comes with piles of regrets.

You don't need any re-assurance of what you did wrong or missed. Instead spend quality time with people that do not re-surface your pains.

If you must re-visit your situation, learn to do this with your therapist; it will be more productive, because your therapist will help you recover easy and faster. Your therapist will guide you in taking lessons that will make you a better person in your next love relationship.

Don't follow them up on their social media platforms to begin a cyber war. I don't think you will smile back when Facebook starts to fetch back those ugly memories.

"Fish gone bad, even with the best spices, it will still taste bad." TS

Keep no contact

People have stayed at the cross-roads for so long because they never cut contacts with their Ex's.

It all comes because at the closure point, people never fully exit. And the victim is usually the person left behind.

A certain girl said, "I am totally powerless when he shows up, I only remember, wake up or sober up after having sex with him. The moment he steps out of the door, my wounds begin to bleed again, all the memories of a life together download and I cry myself to sleep."

Think about this, he left, he has more important issues like "His family" to attend to. He only needs you for pleasure and nothing more. Is this the kind of life you want for yourself?

Another girl mentioned, " My house is in the same neighborhood with my Ex. Most times he shows up at my house un-announced, at times, he calls to find out why I am late, at times he wants to know why some guys visit me."

When we asked her to shift from that neighborhood and cut contact, she said I don't think I can do it, at times I think he's not happy in his marriage, maybe if I keep close, he will come back to me. So sad! Isn't it?

Think about the blended families. Several say, the only reason they keep contact with their Ex's is the shared responsibility of the children. Sounds like a good "excuse." Right? But let me ask some questions. Tell me, why the late night calls in the name of checking on children? Why not check on them during the day?

In the process, be careful about the people you update. Some couples have the wrong friends, when you update them, you arm them to use your updates against you.

You still need to be in touch with your baby momma or the Father of your children because of the shared responsibilities and it's understandable, But why do it in the odd hours, why at the expense of your family? Why dis-respect your wife or husband fidgeting around the house late at night to pick up calls coming from your Ex? Why visit your Ex late night and have sleepovers? I hear “our” children. You are opening a door that will close more important doors on you!

Nothing should be private or confidential about you and your Ex. The day you try to do so will be the start of a downward spiral for your marriage. You will eventually lose your marriage.

Dealing with Friends & Family

This is one of the hardest for most people. When we fall in love, it is inevitable to involve some friends and family members. Some friends and family will genuinely celebrate the union, while others will sit, wait and wish the day the relationship or marriage collapses. This means, at the point of falling out of love, some people will rejoice and celebrate your downfall. So how we deal with friends and family at the point of letting go or taking separate ways really matters.

In the process, be careful about the people you update. Some couples have the wrong friends, when you update them, you arm them to use your updates against you.

Sometimes it's okay to cut off some friends and family members. The worst pain in the separation process, are the words that fly back and forth in a distorted manner. Don't give them discussion points, let them hunt for words, but don't feed them, don't be the source.

Distance from the wrong influence for a while that you may reflect better. Some of our friends know what we want to hear, so they give us the wrong advise because they want to side with us. The best person in your life, when you are faced with critical matters, is a neutral person, someone that does not know you that much and will lose nothing to speak right into your life.

Protect your children

Think about your children and the best way to protect them during the divorce or separation process. Well some couples separate before children get into the picture.

But incase you got children while co-habiting or when properly married, whichever the case, children MUST be protected. At times, couples get so busy fighting and forget that they have a responsibility of protecting and loving and raising their children.

They are young, but they understand, they feel the pain and can NEVER understand why Dad and Mom should separate. When they fail to connect the dots, when you fail to protect their innocent mind, they crush and at-times they completely fail to recover.

This will obviously reflect on their end of term school report card because they spend most of their time trying to process the conflict between their parents, but because their brain or CPU is not strong enough, they collapse! They breakdown! They crush!

You may not see it now, but it eventually reflects in their character as they grow; some of the children become extremely dangerous and rebellious, others resort to drugs.

Think about shared property

This requires focusing; you must be less emotional and very intentional. If you managed to acquire property together, it's fair to walk away with your fair share.

This is common in couples that breakup after several years together. I remember a lady that got my wife and I close to tears when she mentioned, " I contributed my money when we were buying the land, and also contributed to the construction of the house and the car, but because I was deep in love, I did not care to ask if he included my names in the title or the car card. Right now he is throwing me out of the house with my girl and boy, I am walking away with nothing after 8years together."

In a situation were you have shared ownership of some property, it is prudent to talk about a fair share and if you have children involved, discuss custody of the children and co-parenting.

Yes you are letting go, but what are your take-outs?

After several years in a relationship, whether co-habiting or married, you MUST learn some lessons!

The pain we encounter at the point of letting go, pushes us to ask questions that may go unanswered. But as a must, within the un-answered questions lies the triggers. The relationship or marriage did not just end, something happened, it could have started small, but the crack kept growing until it collapsed.

Please note;

Some characters in couples are picked along the way because of bad influence. So it is not a must that situations have a trigger connected or directly linked to you. So a therapist will dig your history in a bid to un-earth a character in your partner, or a pattern in your partner that's been hidden. Sometimes, it can go as far as when she/he was 8years old.

I remember a girl that was raped by her Uncle and was told never to say it out to anyone. She was badly tormented; she felt like her entire family conspired against her, she was only 12years old when she was raped.

The family was mindful of their image, but did not think about her future.

Letting go without picking some lessons, marks you a failure in your next. When we let go, we focus on empowering our selves to build our self-love, esteem and confidence.

Later when she found love, it became completely impossible to have a straight and healthy sexual life with the fiancé. She would get flashy images of rape that happened 15years ago. She's been in and out of 5 love relationships because she can't get the Uncle out of her mind. She came to us when the sixth boyfriend was at the verge of exiting.

When you choose to be less emotional and focus on the cause, soon or later, you will find or recognize the problem. A counselor or therapist will help create the self-awareness needed to deal with the root cause. In this case, this girl needs to fully deal with the rape that happened when she was 12years. Otherwise, it would have been very hard for her to settle in any relationship.

When people fail to deal with the core, they find themselves re-living the same life in another relationship or marriage.

Don't carry your ugly past into the future! Deal with it and completely close the chapter

Trying to deal with the backlog or the core of the issue may scratch our scars and bleed again. But sometimes, it is the road map to our steady recovery and healing.

Well, because we are human, we get emotionally hurt and weep through the pain. At times, its likened to going back 20plus years to deal with your devils. Please be bold enough to do it! CRY if you must.

Never concur with those that call you weak because you are emotionally torn apart. Actually the real danger is in trying to suppress the emotions. We are human! We are not machines!

Letting go without picking some lessons, marks you a failure in your next. When we let go, we focus on empowering our selves to build our self-love, esteem and confidence.

Most people will beat themselves up after a breakup. They will blame themselves for everything that failed. But hey, love or a relationship only happens between two adults. It is only fair to accept our responsibility and act thereof.

Practically, the hardest part is found in addressing the key question of how to start all over again after letting go.

Several are stuck for years after heartbreak because they emotionally act out and ASSUME that they're ready to start all over again. But guess what, they end up re-living the same life in another marriage or relationship.

If you systematically follow the guide above, you will heal faster, your body, soul and mind will steadily recover; you will be a better person in your next relationship.

You can use the next page to write down a simple summary of what we have discussed about letting go. The summary will equip you or answer the question of starting all over again.

Summary:

- Learn to forgive yourself! Break the chains of un-forgiveness.
- No regrets! You are human! You can error.
- Keep no contact. Don't hate them, but don't contact them! They're gone
- Friends and family are vital in our day-to-day life, but sometimes, they've hurt us more than help us. Be careful on how you involve them. Sometimes, if you must lock them out, please do.

- Protect your children; sometimes seek the help of councilors while dealing with children. Any separation will always have a long-term effect on your children.
- Be focused and logical when discussing the property you acquired together.
- Write down the lessons learned in your relationship and fully deal with the backlog.

If you must LET GO, it is better to do it with dignity and respect for yourself.

JAMES' STORY!

A Life Of Denial And Self Inflicted Pain

I met James after a terrible heartbreak and he shared his story;

I found Ruth when no one cared, the person she loved and treasured most had left. She was lonely, terrified and in disarray. In her own words she said, “ I wish I would die, no one in this world cares.” Ruth had turned into a binge drinker! Her life was a total mess.

When I met her, I started by lending a listening ear and a shoulder. I checked on her daily, had several dinner dates and outings trying to comfort her. I was looking for an entry point. She was fun, with a pleasant and magnetic personality and extremely beautiful! I could never get my eyes off her. Truthfully, I thought and spoke back to myself

your instinct if someone doesn't feel right for you.

Walk away rather than settle or expect them to change...
whether they change or not is out of your control!

everyday that “ Only a dummy could leave or throw away such beauty.” I was her only friend and I thought I was her only hope.

On a particular evening after several drinks we ended up at my house and had a romantic sleep over. That night was the spark and the start of a regretful journey. I felt powerless, I could not do without her, I disclosed everything about my finances, my family and me.

Several people that knew Ruth better, tried to talk me out of it. Some of her own friends came to me and tried to warn me, but I deliberately denied them the attention! I thought they were jealousy! I thought they hated Ruth.

Blinded by love, I saw an innocent beautiful girl that deserved the best in this world. I did not care what people thought or said! I had fallen in love!

I did not care to dig her life much or listen to anyone. I thought everyone was wrong. It was the whole world against US. We sang the song “ No body wants to see us together, but it don’t matter, no (cause I got you...)” by Akon.

I hated anyone that discouraged me from pursuing her. All I wanted was to marry Ruth! I felt I was her salvation! I felt I had hunted well.... I was the hero in her life.

Ruth and I eventually got married and got a son, but I did not last that long on my throne as KING & HERO.

What I omitted while dating her somehow came following; it was the bitter truth of why Ruth had lost her marriage- it was Infidelity!

Ruth bruised my ego and trodden upon my pride after catching her in multiple sex scandals with my friends and family.

My pain at that time was inexpressible, I was ashamed of myself, had burnt all the bridges, did not see any possible recovery from my guilt. You can't imagine locking out your workmates and friends that go as back as 15plus years with you and ending up on the road alone!

I've never felt so stupid! I've never been used and dumped when least expected.

I decided to take a DNA paternity test to prove if the boy was my son! I am sure you already know by now that the boy was not mine. When I asked her, she responded, "it's none of your business, just leave me in peace."

I was in pain, did not see myself without her. I had given her my whole! Did not know where to start, I was confused and very bitter. I felt so stupid, hated myself and closed out everyone including my family and friends.

That's James' story! They're several lessons from this story: -

Its possible you have been a dumpee or the dumped at some point in life, whichever the case, any heartbreak comes with pain that's beyond imagination.

Any heartbreak shatters your world, creates a vacuum or emptiness that cannot be comprehended.

But hey, we can draw some lessons from our past that can help us address tougher issues in the future.

Is it possible that James could have escaped this pain?

YES!

James could have escaped this pain if he had asked himself the tough questions out of the gate. Before any commitment, its fair to clear any doubts. You may not have all the answers, but you are far better than someone that starts a race without a destination in mind or one that aims hard and takes several shots in the dark.

What was Ruth's most important need at the point she met James?

Ruth was looking for emotional support, she was in pain after the husband had broken up with her: She was empty, bleeding, confused, hurting, bitter, full of negativity, and out of touch and control with herself. She was not ready for another relationship; she needed time to properly heal.

What did James miss?

James was wrong to think of himself as the savior, he did not come to her rescue, Ruth wanted a person to walk her the road of recovery after her breakup, not another baggage in the form of a lover.

James actually dug a pit for himself when he got emotionally involved and attached to a bleeding Ruth.

“When drowning, you need help from an experienced swimmer not an amateur in a survival mood.” TS

Ruth found a rebound while James found a lover. He was head over heels for a woman that wanted emotional support and healing.

James chose Denial

James saw the reflags; he could have avoided the heartbreak! He could have avoided that bad ending, but like most of us, when we want something badly, at-times we don't want to reason or listen. I call that living in DENIAL.

“Denial is the worst kind of lie... because it is the lie you tell to yourself” Michelle A. Homme

James buried his head in the sand and expected a miracle to happen. But Ruth was a broken vessel, she was wounded, she was in pain, she had lost her marriage because of her un-faithfulness. It was almost impossible for her to wake up and everything is just all right.

After 3plus years, James found himself in a worse place! So sad because even the boy he got in those 3years turned out to be another man's son! What a loss!

Is James to be blamed for falling in love with Ruth?

Definitely NOT! But James had an opportunity to know a little more about Ruth before taking the relationship to another level.

But when the people that knew Ruth tried to approach him, he closed the door to their face, he decided to pursue to no end.

Denial and fantasy was the life that James chose! He saw a beautiful face and body and fell head over heels for a woman that was in a sorry state. Even when his family and friends asked him to go slow, he simply blocked them that he may pursue his dream.

Denial keeps you far from the truth, even when the entire truth is in a crystal clear glass. Some people would rather believe a lie or a fantasy, for as long as it gives them temporary hope and pleasure.

ALWAYS learn something about yourself from that experience to inform yourself in the next one!"

Denial will not give you the right perspective; you will never make sane decisions if you are under the denial cloud. You will stay in the same place wishing, yet you need strength to create an environment that can give you productive and sober thoughts.

I have personally found myself in denial, caught between reality and a wish or fantasy. Reality demands that you can only be in one place at a time, but your wish is to be a superstar, one that can accomplish more on your to-do list in a day.

Several years ago-I made some stupid and regretful decisions. At the point when I started paying for my stupid decisions, I lost friends and valuables.

But I can assure you, I saw it coming, I dreaded the times, but I felt powerless to confront my fears.

When the pain intensified, I remember struggling to accept responsibility, I wanted to blame it on everyone else; it was denial at work. Looking back, I lost a lot of time.

People come and go. You don't get to choose who will stay.

I was stuck! I did not make any shift! I was in endless tears because I could sense disaster, but I was powerless, I could not reverse the process.

A life of denial is real disaster; most people under denial feel the same way JAMES felt. You at times convinced to think the whole world has conspired against you. It's you against everyone! Denial will hinder you from having a fair perspective! If James had asked himself the questions he least wanted to hear, he would have woken up before setting himself up for disappointment and misery.

Acting Under Pressure From Others

Most people are married but for the wrong reasons. And one of the wrong reasons is to marry under pressure from any external factors.

I remember my beautiful friend Olga that ended up a victim to this. She had tried several relationships and gotten a son outside wedlock.

She religiously believed in giving her son a bright future. She had prayed and believed that a man would come knocking on her door some day, but most of the men that knocked at her door were married or already committed.

She was under a lot of pressure from her family to get a man, all her siblings had gotten married and she was the eldest but still not married.

She hated visiting family members, because the only conversation was about when she was getting married. The poor lady was doing her level best, but most men that showed up were married, committed or very un-serious guys that did not want commitment.

She later compromised and managed to get married! At least she managed to fulfill everyone's desire, but at the expense of her own happiness.

She paid for her introduction ceremony, paid for her wedding, furnished the house, paid rent, bought a family car, that she later gave to the husband, fueled the car everyday inclusive of servicing it. Needless to mention feeding for the home and taking care of herself when she conceived.

She tried hard to uphold her marriage vows just like any girl raised in a family with values and morals. But that could not last forever. She was giving her entire life to a man that did not notice her submissiveness, care and love. They later divorced!

“ Sometimes, in order to follow our moral compass and/or our hearts, we have to make unpopular decisions or stand up for what we believe in.”
Tabatha Coffey

The people that push you into making hasty decisions will not be there when the heat turns on. You will actually act immature and nagging when you try to drag them into your frustrations!

You must learn to defend what you believe, that does not necessarily mean being rigid or not flexible, but being wise to make decisions that are authentic, true and at peace with your own self and heart.

“It is easier to pay the price for a decision you made, than a decision made for you” TS

CHOOSE TO BE HAPPY! MOVE ON IF YOU'RE NOT NEEDED

*A*fter a setback, heartbreak, betrayal or rejection, that does not mean the end of your life! You genuinely loved! You gave them your ALL! If life has not smiled back at you, choose to believe that it is the start of a new chapter; it is another opportunity to breathe and believe God for better. If they don't want you, someone has been praying and waiting for the day he/she will cast his/her eyes on you.

The mistakes we make after heartbreak, betrayal or rejection is to stay stuck to a closed door crying and wailing! When they close a door to your face, respect yourself enough to stop knocking at the window! Save yourself the pain, keep some dignity to yourself and walk away.

Some people will try to convince everyone to believe their story or win them over. It is not about who is right or wrong. You don't need a pity party!

Some people derive happiness and satisfaction from you pursuing, begging, calling and sending texts and crying to be taken back. The day you stop chasing, the day you accept and take responsibility, its so funny, how the human mind works, they will start checking on you to see if you can come back running,

When you walk away do not keep contact, create an ex-free kind of environment and accept responsibility!

You Don't Need A Pity Party!

Some people will try to convince everyone to believe their story or win them over. It is not about who is right or wrong. You don't need a pity party! You've been left behind; he/she is probably better without you! You need to reflect better, you need to regain you! You need to win yourself over and over. It is a battle of the mind. You need to re-collect yourself and take back the control.

Choose you! Choose to be happy! Life is too short to wallow in self-pity.

"Happiness is a choice, letting go is a choice, but a better life thereafter is a consequence of a choice you make in favor of you and no-one else" TS

Clear the fog

The longer you stay in the fog or un-certainty, the more the pain and lost time. Even if the world was on your side that would never change the fact that he/she left you. So pick up your pieces and start on your recovery journey.

“ It hurts to let go, but sometimes it hurts more to hold on.” if he/she is stupid enough to walk away, wipe away your tears, be smart enough to let go.

The recovery may take sometime, but hey, I like the fact that you’ve managed to start walking closer to a better life. Wipe away the tears, smile to the future that has loads of goodness waiting for you.

“Weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning.” Psalms 30.5

So happy I managed to let go! I deserved better!

“ It can be difficult to leave a long term relationship even when our inner-wisdom tells us to let go. At this point we can let go and endure the intense pain of leaving behind the familiar to make way for anew chapter in our life or we can stay and suffer a low-grade pain that slowly eats away at our heart and soul like an emotional cancer. Until we wake up one day and realize we are buried so deep in the dysfunction of a relationship that we scarcely remember who we were and what we wanted and needed to be.” Jeada Dewalt

I am lighter! Feels like I was carrying the world on my shoulders

For us to have a happy life and face the future with courage after a huge setback, heartbreak or betrayal, we will start by completely clearing the emotional baggage. It is not easy to wake up on the other side of the road, with a very clear conscious and with no emotion baggage of what your relationship would have been, or accusing yourself of not being enough, or doing enough to keep the love flame burning. But hey, for you to face the future, you must learn to close the door to the past! I think you should be bold enough to close that chapter. Well, at times you may miss them, but that does not mean you need them back into your life. The weight of trying to be them,

You may have started out great, but the second you both start to realize you want different things, it's time to let it go. No matter how much you love that person,
you need to love yourself first.

thinking for them, trying to impress them, walking on eggshells just to put a smile on their face is no more. It is time to think about you! It is time to love yourself and be happy that you're not at anyone's mercies.

Maybe we were NEVER meant to be and it's OK!

The bitter truth is some people were never meant to be, we loved them, but they simply were a means to the end! Rough as it may sound, please understand, if they were never meant to be, they will leave. So at times, the earlier they leave, the better. If you have found yourself in a place where someone has left you for another. Think about it, maybe they were never meant to be. Is it possible to start a life without them? I think yes! All that you need is to simply believe that they are done, they've played their part, but your life has just started.

Get on the road again, don't be sorry! Don't be sad! It is the start of a new day! A better new you deserves much better.

A decision has already been made; you need friends that facilitate your growth and happiness

Friends play a vital role in your recovery journey. Some friends will not positively facilitate your recovery or transition; they will judge you and take sides. At times in our counseling sessions, we have advised our clients to completely avoid contact mostly with shared friends with an Ex. Some of the pain comes from twisted or distorted information!

Keep friends that will;

- Boost your self-esteem and confidence
- Love you and support your decisions
- Pray with you and watch your back

Seek proper closure, it will clear you guilt.

If you feel he/she did not give you the audience to close well. A lot happens between people in love! Sometimes the person left behind may not be interested in meeting or having a logical conversation, if it is still fresh, give them time. But even when left behind, I think, you should free yourself from the chains of un-forgiveness. You don't have to look at him/her as an enemy, free yourself up, and seek proper closure. If he/she does not respond positively, don't push.

At-least you have tried to request for a logical and more civilized way to handle the issue, but he/she does not seem to have the same perspective as yours. Just let yourself off the chain of unforgiveness, completely set him/her free. Be free and breathe.

The chains are broken! The shackles have fallen

Knowing that you are free at last! Lightens and opens up your heart again, your interaction and perception about life and relationships begins to change. You eventually find yourself doing the things that you love and the things that give you happiness, you also feel free to meet new people and fly.

“It’s so hard to forget pain, but it’s even harder to remember sweetness. We have no scar to show for happiness. We learn so little from peace.” Chuck Palahniuk.

Happiness is a choice! We choose to be happy no matter what. You have the ability to create lasting happiness for yourself. Falling in love with someone is a decision to be happy, when our decision to be happy does not fetch the results we anticipated, we quickly embark on a recovery journey. We collect the broken pieces and put them back together. We ultimately choose to be happy, regardless of the different situations that rob us of the joy!

Weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning. The morning has come, no more tears of sorrow, only tears of joy. May God close the doors to all evil plans against you. Everything that's fake, will not come nigh to you, God will not allow fake Men and Women to succeed in their ambition toward you. You deserve better! No more tears! A new chapter of your life opens today. You are destined for greatness!

Go for it and enjoy.

IT ALL STARTS HERE!

Thank you so much for taking time to read the book "TEARS ON MY PILLOW." I believe you've been inspired by the real life stories, wisdom and experiences shared in this book. If you've been inspired, I am sure you will "CHOOSE YOU"

regardless of the tears you've shed in the past, you will choose to be a different you.

Several years ago I chose to be me, I chose to wipe my tears and face the future with courage. It was ME, CHOOSING ME! I must confess, I am a better person today. Everything shared in this book is practical and very instrumental when dealing with tears.

We have deliberately given you a tool to use when life seems to take annoying turns on you. "TEARS ON MY PILLOW" must empower you to see a different you, to put an end to misery, meaningless emotional tortures and bounce back with resilience, hope and faith.

The 360 turn you need starts today! Starts now! It all starts here; you and no one else must choose to put an end to relationships that suck life out of you.

Enough of the tears, enough of trying to fit in, enough of being favored, enough of the betrayal, mind games, emotional and psychological torture.

This is me, choosing me!
